Whiteside Is a Strong Feature In New Play

DRAMATICALLY absorbing and highlighted with flashes of humor and with Walker Whiteside in the title role, proved delightfully entertaining to a large audience at the Heilig last night. Master of Ballantrae" is largely Mr. Whiteside's play, for as the ne'erdo-well, likeable, charming liar and general scoundrel, James Durie, he dominates the action and situations throughout, and knowing him for what he is all the time, Mr. Whiteside nevertheless makes of his character a personality that one wants to like and sympathize with-no matter how unworthy.

There is nothing lacking, either, in the players in support of Mr. White-side. May Buckley as Jessie Broun, the wronged woman, stops just short of overdoing a clever bit in a drunken scene, and William H. Sullivan as Colonel Burke, in the few lines he has to say, is delightfully Irish. Character marks the work also of Carl Vose, a servant, and of Maurice Barrett, the Hindu gentleman. Frederick Roland is convincing as Henry Durie, the younger and wronged son of Lord Durie, played Harry Dornton, and Hubert Druce is delightful as the old steward. Syd-ney Shields is the second woman memof the cast, playing Allson, Henry Durie's wife, and is effective in the amotional opportunities offered her.

"The Master of Ballantrae," as a play, is naturally somewhat theatric, but so absorbing and intense in action d so well acted, that the mechanics of the piece do not intrude. The text runs largely to form as prepared by Robert Louis Stevenson. James Durie returns to the home of his fathers after 10 years of wandering, when he is believed lead. By his father and his former Alison, now married to Henry, James' brother, James is welcomed with open arms. Henry, knowing the sinister purpose of James' visit, and of his perfidy, and his betrayal of Jessie Broun, whom Henry is helping, seeks to be rid of James—the artful liar who even wins Alison's promise to flee with him-but fate, in the person of the Indian servant, and a Hindu trick, intervenes, and James, master of Ballantrae, gallant scoundrel that he is, passes out—as the only logical conclusion and denouement. The piece is effectively staged. It will go tonight and tomorrow afternoon and tomorrow night at the Heilig.

Theatrical Woman

Ahead of Mitzl in "Head Over Heels." due for early showing at the Hellig, Mrs. E. A. Bachelder, representing Henry W. Savage productions, is in Portland making arrangements for the reception and entertainment of her little star. Theatrical business throughout the land, says Mrs. Bachelder, whose husband is also a showman, was never better, and for this reason Mr. Savage feels safe in sending his big productions way out here into God's country, practically intact as they play in New York. And Mrs. Bachelder has found, as we all know, that the Far Westerners are fully capable of appreciating the best in dramatic art and musical comedy.
