TRADE RELATIONS WITH SOVIET IS HELD NECESSARY

By David Lawrence

(Copyright, 1920.)
Washington, April 6.—Trade relations between the United States and the people of Russia, whether the latter are under the jurisdiction of the soviets or any other faction, will shortly be resumed.

The United States government has been waiting for an answer from the allies as to the course other nations would pursue, but the suggestions and counter-suggestions have thus far yielded no concrete understanding.

It is the intention of our government, if an answer is not forthcoming very soon, to advise American citizens to go ahead irrespective of the action of the other powers. Any American would be able to trade with Russia at his own risk.

TRADING NOT OFFICIAL

This means that diplomatic protection in the event of losses or disagreements will not be afforded at present, though later on, when a government in Russia is finally recognized, the department of state would doubtless insist upon the assumption of responsibility by any new government for the transactions or claims pending against its predecessor.

The United States looks upon the question of commerce with Russia with non-political eyes. There is no embargo against the Russian trade, and the individuals who may be principals in the soviet regime. To an American citizen Russians would be on the same footing. Goods can be bought or sold and transported to and from Russia, but all arrangements must be made without the moral or physical assistance of the United States government.

With respect to recognition of the soviets, there is as yet no sign of any change of policy and it is extremely unlikely that this presidential year the Democratic administration would lay itself open to attack as sympathetic with the Bolshevik by taking the lead in extending recognition.

Of one thing the public may rest assured: Information here would seem to indicate that under no circumstances will the allies recognize the soviets, unless there is definite stopping of any policy of international revolution or propaganda looking toward that end.

While officials are inclined to look upon the matter of soviet regime as a form of government set up by Russians for Russia, they are firmly set against the continuance of any external activity or missionary work for soviet methods. The deportation proceedings against Ludwig Martens, the self-styled "ambassador" of the soviets, is as much a warning against any future attempt to introduce revolutionary propaganda in the United States as it is a punishment for Martens.

APPEAL TO RUSSIANS

Our government officials deem themselves to be acting on the solid ground of international law and understanding in refusing to recognize any government one of whose aims is the overthrow of government unlike its own. The department of state claims that revolutionary propaganda is inspired by the soviets and that the task of Martens was to spread soviet doctrines in the United States.

Of course this is not denying the probability that relations with Russia will tend to emphasize sooner or later the political aspects of this problem and that a decision of some kind will become necessary. On the other hand, it is thought possible that with the return of trade, the Russian people themselves will be better able to understand the viewpoint of the outside world toward political recognition and will eventually compel those governing Russia to change their tactics toward other nations.

KERENSKY'S MEN REMAIN

Incidentally, an interesting question has just been raised concerning the occupancy of the Russian embassy building in Washington. A rumor has been current for several days that the department of state had ordered out the present occupants of the building, namely M. B. Akmeteff and others, who came here as the representatives of the Kerensky government.

But there is no truth in the rumor. Officials of the department tell the writer that the United States government has no jurisdiction over the embassy building. Our government does not recognize the Kerensky men any more than it does the Martens group. But, as for the building, possession is nine points of the law and until the government of the United States enters into diplomatic relations with a government in Russia from whom instructions can be received concerning the occupancy of the building, no action will be taken against the present tenants.

INSTANCE OF CARRANZA

Again and again the department of state has been confronted with this problem, particularly with respect to Mexico. The Carranza instance is the Mexican embassy for many months prior to formal recognition of the Carranza government. Embassy buildings are the property of foreign governments and the rule which has been followed here is to refrain from interference with the last occupants of a legation or embassy until a new government is formally recognized and arranges for diplomatic representation.

Roofs of Houses to Indicate Name of Town to Airplanes

By their roofs shall pilots and observers in the air service plan the towns over which they pass in patrolling Oregon forests this summer. Upon the roof of some prominent building in each town is to be placed in large letters the initials or other designation for the town.

Aerial maps are now being prepared by Forest Examiners W. B. Osborne Jr., the inventor of the Osborne fire finder, and C. W. Boyce, who made a name for himself in aerial photography during the war, when he was in the air service.

The maps will show types of forest cover as they appear from the air, old burns, heavy timber stands, second growth, mountain meadows and emergency landing fields. A method of detecting smoke from logging camps and mills will also be devised.

James Hughes Sought
