

OUTLAW RAILROAD STRIKE FORESEEN LONG WHILE AGO

By David Lawrence
(Copyright, 1920)
Washington, April 13.—Open rebellion on the railroads of the country has given the government a problem even more complicated than the coal strike. It was not a sudden revolt. Trouble has been brewing for many weeks and the department of justice has been watching certain radical leaders who have been fomenting mutiny. As a matter of fact, the department expected a break in another industry to occur before the railroad men struck.

It was a day of "I told you so" at the department of justice, where the railroad strike was attributed entirely to a conspiracy of "radicals" and "Bolsheviks," who have begun a process of "boring from within" in an effort to overthrow the more sensible and conservative leaders of organized labor. INDICTMENTS THREATENED

"We have been warning the country against the activity of radicals," said one official of the department, "but we have been accused of seeing things and exaggerating."

Officials pointed out that while the number of men out on strike was not considerable it was possible for any small number to tie up the transportation systems of the country, especially when adopting guerrilla warfare tactics of suspending work without notice.

Attorney General Palmer got back to Washington from Georgia and began examining the reports of confidential agents to see what evidence had been collected on which prosecutions can be based. If it is found that a conspiracy exists, indictments will be placed against the leaders who participated, and it is also quite possible that the government may proceed against individual strikers on the ground that they have interrupted the transportation of the nation's food supply.

The lever act still holds good and it is a lucky thing that the peace resolution framed by the house has not yet passed the senate or been put on the statute books, for the department of justice will try to make use of some wartime laws in handling the present situation on the railroads.

Inquiry at all the government departments where information might possibly be collected concerning the strike develops the fact that the outbreak on the railroads was premeditated and that the dismissal of a conductor on a western railroad was simply a pretext.

Inside the railroad brotherhoods a persistent effort has been made to dislodge William G. Lee, veteran leader of the railroad men, and the failure of the latter to secure increases in wages in his negotiations with the railroad administration and railroad employees have given the insurgents food for revolt.

UNIONS STEADFAST
This situation is hardly parallel to the coal strike, though in many of its aspects there are points of similarity. The government then proceeded by injunction against a group of leaders who presented radical demands but had the rank and file in their control.

There is no doubt today of the sincerity of the union leaders when their men refused to go back to work in spite of formal notice that the strike had ceased. There is no doubt today of the sincerity of the union leaders when their men refused to go back to work in spite of formal notice that strike had ceased.

ter have dangled a program of higher wages and other alluring demands as the certain reward of a strike at this psychological moment, when the railroads are being recovered by their owners and there is an inevitable confusion in disassembling the tangles of government control. Unquestionably, the effect of the present disturbances will be a further investigation of the true situation among the railroad workers of the country, and the immediate establishment of the railroad labor board provided by recent legislation. President Wilson is expected momentarily to announce the personnel of the board. This will afford a tribunal before which the whole case can be tried.
