

DRIVERS' LICENSE LAW IS EFFECTIVE; PUBLIC GUARDED

The licensing drivers law, conceived and enacted to provide officials with a stronger weapon for use against reckless automobile drivers, became effective Thursday, July 1. Under its terms no person will be permitted to operate an automobile in Oregon without a license issued by the secretary of state.

Because of the great number to be issued, however, and the inability of the secretary of state's office to afford all drivers licenses today, arrests will not be made for operating cars without permits until all applicants have been supplied with licenses, the secretary of state has announced.

MAY DENY LICENSES The law provides that the secretary may refuse to issue driving permits upon evidence indicating that the applicant is a reckless driver or, is physically, mentally or morally unfit to operate a motor vehicle. Or, after the license has been issued, it may be suspended or revoked by the secretary of state upon similar evidence.

Holders of suspended licenses may obtain a hearing within 30 days to show cause why the license should not be permanently revoked. The purpose of the act is to give the state authority to banish the chronically reckless from the road. In the past fines have been almost the sole deterrent to reckless drivers. Although the law provides jail sentences for violations of traffic law, offenders have been able through appeals and otherwise to evade the jail terms.

REMEDY IS SOUGHT To break the ring of recklessness that was collecting a heavy toll of life and limb in Portland, the licensing drivers act was passed at the recent special session of the legislature. Although many Portland drivers have established records sufficiently bad to warrant refusal of licenses, it is announced by the traffic bureau that recommendations to that end will not be made at this time. On the first indication of continued reckless tendencies, however, the bureau will ask that the licenses of those with long records be revoked, it is stated.

Law enforcement officials in Portland are elated with application of the drivers act. They are confident that with such a weapon reckless driving can be reduced to the minimum in this state. It is the most powerful law yet afforded the police and courts, they say, with which to combat the reckless.
