Reports of Big Fund In Portland Bank for Red Defense Denied

Printed reports from Seattle that an W. W. defense fund of $125,000 had been raised and deposited in a Portland bank, probably under a fictitious name, are not true, according to federal investigators, who were questioned Friday. "The mayor of Portland has stood behind his policemen, and has made this city an undesirable place for outlaws." one of the men said, "and for this reason I do not believe the I. W. W. organization would have the courage to try such thing in Portland."

Federal investigators found an office in Seattle where about $17,500 had been stored in a safe. This is said to have been part of the Centralia defense fund.

"Corporal Reichey and Private Marino are detailed to get 2500 rounds of ammunition up tonight." That was the order given by Captain James S. Gay Jr., commanding Battery B, in the latter part of August. 1918, when the battery was on the Argonne front, near Gennes. F. B. Reichey and R. Marino didn't know where 2500 rounds of ammunition was located, and neither did anybody else. Captain Gay didn't, either, but the ammunition had to be there. The battle had raged heavily that day and by dawn it would start again, and there was but little ammunition in reach. The rain was pouring down, the roads were almost impassable, the enemy was searching out the rear with powerful shells. Corporal Reichey and his detail started plunging back along the road, trusting to luck to come up with an ammunition dump. After three miles they were halted by a sentry. A lieutenant in command of a squad of men was guarding the ammunition dump and he knew nothing about the needs of B, and what was more, as he roughly explained, he didn't care. His orders were to hold what was more, as he roughly explained, he didn't care. His orders were to hold it for another regiment of field artil-

"I am Captain James S. Gay, commanding Battery B, 148th field artillery." declared Corporal Reichey, "and this ammunition gets up toemy battery tonight. Get to Hades out of here." The lieutenant was astounded, surprised, mystified. But he surrendered the ammunition and the carts to push it in and two men to help. By morning there was 1500 rounds of ammunition in place and a larger detail was given to bring up.

Sergeant D. J. McGillis, the regimental supply sergeant of the Fifth infantry. Oregon National Guard, is the best known non-commissioned officer in the regiment. He was formerly supply sergeant of Company B, Third Oregon, and is an experienced army man. Sergeant McGillis was a cowboy in early days and not a movie buccaroo, either, but the kind that made hard and dirty work out of the real thing. It is said he knows where every shoe-lace and empty cartidge shell in the Fifth regiment is or ought to be. He was appointed regimental supply sergeant in April, 1919, when there were few supplies and not much of a regiment, and he has stuck to the job and faithfully assisted in to the job and faithfully assisted in L.
