That he's too big.

That he needs to run largely to feet and whiskers.

That the least stain in the ceiling of the Heilig theatre hasn't been fixed up.

That when a milk bottle accidentally drops and breaks on the pavement the driver should be considered enough of others to remove the glass.

That motorists suffer the consequences of such carelessness.

That the symphony of the sirens Friday morning was enough to wake the dead.

That it didn't warn us, but the L. W. and our neighbors told us about it.

That Joe the mechanic is a great friend to the pigeons at Broadway and Washington.

That occasionally he also slips a cigar to Kelly, the big traffic officer.

That it's a dangerous practice for the woman at the wheel of her limousine to try to "window shop" while she's driving.

That vacationists are returning from the beaches to get the youngsters ready for school.

That sometimes in the best regulated families the telephone is temporarily disconnected.

That some folks like to sit and think.

That others just sit.

BURGESS BEDTIME STORIES

Striped Chipmunk Tells About Shadow
By Thornton W. Burgess

There's nothing in the world so sad as being known as a Stuffed Chipmunk.

After a long, long time Striped Chipmunk stopped shaking with fear.

When he stopped shaking the little Rabbit bit stopped shaking. There they had crouched between two stones of the old wood.

Instantly Striped Chipmunk scrambled out of his hiding place. No one was to be seen.

"He is gone!" he cried. "He didn't come quite far enough to find us and now he has gone somewhere else. Come on out."

Peter Rabbit's lost little son climbed out on the big stone beside Striped Chipmunk.

"Tell me," he said, "something about Shadow the Weasel. He didn't look at all big to me. In fact, he didn't look much bigger than you. He was longer, that was all. Two of us together ought to be too much for him."

"Dear me! Dear me!" exclaimed Striped Chipmunk. "Shadow innocent you are. You have a lot, a tremendous lot to learn. Shadow the Weasel is the most wicked fellow in the Great World. He would rather eat Reddy Fox and Grandy Fox and Old Man Coyote than Shadow the Weasel, any time. They kill only for food; he finds sport in killing. It wouldn't make any difference if he had just had the finest meal in the world he would kill you or me if he got the chance and do it just for fun. He is all bad. The worst of it is, there is no place in which either of us can hide that he cannot find us. He is so slim that he can follow anywhere that I can go, and I can go in places where you cannot."

It would be bad enough if he hunted with his eyes alone, and there would be some chance then. All that would be necessary would be to keep out of his sight and nobody knows how to do a nose better than he does. He doesn't depend on his eyes at all. He just uses that nose of his to follow the scent of those he is hunting.

"One day he found my tracks and followed me right straight down into my house under ground. I thought he would get me that time. Yes sir, I certainly thought he would get me that time, but I fooled him. I guess he is still wondering what became of me."

Taking his host of friends by surprise, W. West, member of the Firm of Strange & West of The Dalles slipped quietly away to Vancouver, Wash., Tuesday night.

B. E. Sykes, manager of the Sandy Cooperative creamery of Sandy, and Miss Ethel Rymer quietly slipped away to Vancouver Wednesday and were married in the city.

Mrs. C. A. Hayes of Lebanon celebrated her birthday Friday with a family reunion at the home.
