Well-Balanced Program at Hippodrome

HONORS are so nearly even between two particularly good acts on the new bill opening at Loew's Hippodrome Thursday that it is difficult to determine which is the headliner.

The four Meryl Prince Girls are a quartet of more than passing merit. These attractive songsters have a musical offering which made such a hit with the audience that they found difficulty in getting off stage.

Equally as popular were William Morrow and company, a man and a very charming maid, in a sketch entitled "On a Country Road." In this number the man does some very clever imitations, and his droll love-making drew shouts of laughter from the crowd.

McConnell and West, a long, slim man and a willowy girl in a fascinatingly wicked costume, have a singing and story-telling skit that went well.

Richard Wally and company present an extra good juggling act. Sonia and company, two men and a young woman with a sweet singing voice, have an athletic turn.

Lyons and Moran, in the comedy "Once a Plumber," is the picture offering.

Trotter notices

WHAT a few more blustery days and the leaf last upon the tree won't be able to cling on any longer.

That a leafy carpet on the street car tracks makes traction somewhat difficult.

That the motorman is all right as long as he has plenty of sand.

That "sand" is a more or less valuable ingredient in the make-up of every individual.

That "grit" is another name for it.

That it shouldn't be confused with "brass."

That we know of no more desolate and dismal looking place in town than the junk man's sector of Front street on a rainy night.

That the safety zone crossing markings are growing rather dim.

That the last time they were painted they were dotted up in green, yellow and red in honor of the visiting Shriners.

That the motion picture theatres are campaigning a little for their favorite candidates.

That some men who will devote time and energy to breaking in a new pipe, never show the same interest in the training of their children.

The End of Buster Bear's Dream

By Thornton W. Burgess

The worst of things must have an end. May this come comfort to you, Buster Bear.

BUSTER BEAR'S bad dream was just about as bad as it could be. He was no bigger than Striped Chipmunk, and he was being chased by Farmer Brown's boy, who was as tall as the tallest tree, was as big as Blacby the Crow. Could anything have been more dreadful? The humming of those terrible Bees filled all the Green Forest. When Farmer Brown's boy shouted his voice was like thunder.

Buster ran until he felt that he couldn't run another step. Behind him the humming of those terrible Bees grew louder and louder, which meant that they were getting nearer and nearer. Just in front of him lay a hollow log. In the side of it was a knot hole just big enough for him to squeeze through, for you know he was no bigger than striped Chipmunk. Buster wasted no time. He squeezed through that hole and then crouched down way up in the end of that hollow log.

He heard those great Bees gather around that knot-hole, it was too small for them to get through. They were angrier than ever, as Buster could tell by their humming. They were angry because he had escaped. Then he heard the sound of great feet. The humming of the Bees stopped. Buster held his breath. He hoped, as never in all his life he had hoped before, that Farmer Brown's boy hadn't seen him enter the hollow log.

But he hoped in vain. "Ha!" exclaimed a great voice, the most terrible voice he ever had heard. It was the voice of Farmer Brown's boy. "Ha! you black rascal, I've got you now!"

Buster Bear shivered and shook and his teeth chattered with fear. Suddenly a terrible noise made him jump almost out of his skin. Farmer Brown's boy was pounding that hollow log with a stick to try to make him run out. But Buster didn't run. He simply tried to make himself as small as possible, in the furthest end of that hollow log.

Then he felt himself being lifted up and up and up. Farmer Brown's boy had picked up that hollow log. What was going to happen? What was Farmer Brown's boy going to do? If Buster had been frightened before he was terrified now. Never in all his life had he felt so helpless. Then he felt himself
