Although the motor car as a gen-eral subject is probably understood by the average person better than most any other topic of equal importance, there is an interesting phase that still remains unsolved by many.

Would you not like to know just when a motor car is worn out? Cer-tainly you would, for then you could be very careful not to buy one in that condition.

It would seem funny indeed if peo-ple should be so ignorant as to ahan-don an otherwise perfectly comfort-able home because the windows were badly broken and they could not keep the place warm, or, buy a new range for the kitchen just because the grates had been burned out of the old one. These parts in comparison with the whole are very small, yet the complete success of the house or the store de-pend on them. When they are re-stored or repaired, the house is again comfortable and the store just as good as new.

A motor car is never entirely worn out; it may become undesirable property by becoming out of date or by needing more repair parts than would equal the value of the rebuilt car. But this is not the average condition, and a used rebuilt car usually offers the highest possible value for the money invested.
