Approximately nuts on the ground, Then had come a shrill warning to hide, from his cousin, Chatterer the Red Squirrel. He had looked up to see a great two-legged giant pointing what seemed like a stick at him. He had jumped for the nearest tree and whisked around the trunk. As he did so there was a flash from that stick pointed at him by the two-legged giant, a terrible noise, and something hit him, hurting terribly. Somehow, he had

Perhaps it is just as well that he didn't know that, for if he had known it he would have suffered again the terrible fear which had been his when he heard the hunter climbing toward his hiding place. Poor Rusty! He was in dreadful trouble, and through no fault of his own. For him was gone all the brightness of a beautiful day, all the joy of honest work. In their place was hopeless suffering.
