Louis J. Wilde, as Mayor of San Diego, Raps His Townsmen

Louis J. Wilde, whom Portland people have not forgotten, seems to desire that the citizenry of San Diego, where he now reigns as mayor, shall not permit him to pass from their recollection when his term of office runs out, as it is soon to do.

Wilde apparently is in the midst of a fight in that sunny southern city. Accordingly, a few days ago he took his pen in hand and wrote a few lines to the people of that municipality. Starting with the announcement that he does not expect to be a candidate for mayor in the spring election, he lays on for the benefit of certain interests which, judging from his remarks, are trying to destroy the commission form of government now in vogue there. He tells his constituents some plain facts.

"You are so stewed in this small-town nagging," he writes, "that you are running amuck with a bullfrog race chart ordinance and the follies of 1920. Curative agency is lost sight of entirely. You are blinded by the glittering folly of hobby. But the mayor cannot get the unconscious side of present day events awakened or before you because of the hookworm infestation of a great majority and the rattlesnake hatred of a penurious minority. You listen to the effeminate side of men and the masculine side of women. If there are any brains here, they have not put in an appearance. Why don't you harness up for real teamwork and build up a city instead of tearing down a village?"

Mayor Wilde says many other things of like intent in his communication, but those sentences quoted are sufficient to show that his pen has lost none of its virility and his diction none of its punch.

SUPREME COURT'S DECISION TO CLOSE COURTHOUSE WAR

Klamath Falls, Dec. 1.—What is believed to be one of the final phases of a strife that has torn Klamath county for more than a decade, destroyed lifetime friendships, split churches and fraternal organizations, divided families against themselves and incidentally put many dollars in the pockets of attorneys and politicians, resulted Tuesday with news that the supreme court reversed the recent decision of Judge Hamilton of Roseburg favoring the Hot Springs faction in the county court house fight.

The old courthouse, which has stood for a generation at Fourth and Main streets, long has been inadequate to serve the needs of the county. When it was decided to construct a new building, the Klamath Development company, which was engaged in the building up of the east end of the city, offered an imposing site in the Hot Springs addition, which then was, and still is, some blocks away from the main business district of the city.

PEOPLE ASKED TO VOTE
The people were asked to vote their choice between this and the old site at Fourth and Main. They chose the Hot Springs site. The county administration went ahead with the building and spent more than $200,000. Before the work was completed, however, County Judge Hanks was elected, representing the other faction. Before his term expired he started another building on the old courthouse site, following which move he was recalled from office and County Judge Bunnell installed.

Enough money had been turned over by the Hanks administration to complete Courthouse No. 2, with the aid of private subscriptions from friends of that faction, so that, in spite of the efforts of Bunnell and his colleagues, the newest courthouse was completed and ready for occupancy while the work on the Hot Springs edifice, which is much more pretentious than the Main street building, was tied up by injunctions.

ONE JUDGE BALKS
Circuit Judge D. V. Kuykendall of Klamath county refused two years ago to hear the various suits, the principal one of which was the action of Contractor Dougan of Portland to recover $45,000 spent in construction of the Main street courthouse. Judge F. M. Calkins of Jackson county was secured to act in the matter. An affidavit of prejudice was filed later against him and Judge Hamilton was selected. His verdict in favor of the Hot Springs element was most emphatic.

In the meantime, with one courthouse failing to pieces, another standing for eight years well along toward completion, one new and ready to occupy, being used temporarily to take care of the overflow of public schools, the trials of the circuit court are being held in the city hall.

Jacksonville Will Ask Appointment of Special Prosecutor

Medford, Dec. 1.—Claiming that the local county prosecutor would be more or less subject to influence and opinion, citizens of Jacksonville are circulating a petition to be presented to Governor Olcott for the appointment of a special prosecutor to try the Bank of Jacksonville cases, which come up at the February term of circuit court.

The petition sets forth that such an appointment would be in the interest of a thorough trial. Rawley Moore, the newly elected county prosecutor, has an open mind, he told the committee which called on him to ask about a special prosecutor. He is not adverse to a special prosecutor, but will begin at once collecting data and evidence for the prosecution of the cases.
