BETTY COMPSON in a scene from "The Law and the Woman," which is providing acceptable entertainment to patrons of the Liberty theatre this week.

By A. S. J.
Never write love letters until after you are married—then write them to your wife and make her destroy them. The policy of this axiom is feelingly set forth in "The Law and the Woman," a screen drama of force and merit appearing this week at the Liberty theatre.

Winsome Betty Compton, as a young wife of an unfortunate victim of guilting, bluet-doux, is the heroine and star de luxe of the production and is supported by a cast of rare ability. The plot of the "The Law and the Woman" is rather too involved for comfort and one is kept at a high nervous tension throughout the performance. The action is continuous and works up to a decidedly gruesome tragedy which leaves its impress after the near-happy finale. Many of the dramatic situations seem a trifle forced.

There is nothing novel in Julian Rolfe's emphatic declaration to his bride that he never had loved another woman, and his mental reservation touching upon an old affair with Clara Foster has frequent parallels in life. That Clara should have saved Julian's letters; that she should meet and vamp his million-aire ward in Paris and return to New York on the same boat with him; that she should threaten to show the old letters to Julian's wife Margaret—all this is probable enough.

But when Clara gets possession of a pistol belonging to Julian and thereby makes him the victim of a horrible conspiracy; when Julian is convicted and given the death sentence on the day his wife gives birth to a son; when Margaret takes on the habit of a vamp and works on Clara's superstitious fears to secure a confession on the very day set for Julian's execution—all this is rather strained. It is with something of relief, then, that one passes to the excellent comedy which follows the main event at the Liberty this week. The usual musical program brightens up the bill and one is permitted to say that the entertainment is very much worth while.
