the usual daytime costume follows the conservatively straight, unbroken lines. Except for the exaggeratedly bouffant taffetas and moires of the dance frock. There is no limit, however, to the variety of detail which may ornament the surface of a frock. The charming crepe de chine frock shown at the left is almost chemise-like in its simplicity of line, but unusual interest is displayed in the arrangement of the pleated frillings of contrasting organdie which stimulate front and back panels and divide the sleeves and sides of the skirt into decorative curves. The shirtwaist frock at the right, developed in creps and habutal silk for the guimpe, with a kasha cloth or flannel and handkerchief linen, also relies chiefly upon the chic of its details for distinction.
