

SCHOOL TEACHER HELD FOR CRIME AGAINST 2 GIRLS

Salem, June 13.—C. A. Sloat, Oakville, Or., school teacher, in jail at Albany, has admitted that he is the man, who, on March 5, lured two small Salem girls to a lonely spot in a pasture south of the city, according to District Attorney John Carson and Sheriff Oscar Bower. One of the children claims she was attacked there and the other was submitted to indignities. Sloat's admission, made in the presence of Carson, Bower and Deputy Prosecutor Lyle Page in the jail at Albany, Monday, goes only so far as the luring of the tots to the pasture is concerned; that he committed any crime against the girls he denies.

The identification of Sloat as the man wanted on the Salem charge was made by two girls, daughters of prominent Salem families, whose names are still withheld by authorities in an effort to avoid embarrassing publicity to the victims of the attack. When the girls faced Sloat in the jail at Albany they are said to have immediately identified him as the man who attacked them.

The alleged crime was committed Sunday morning. Two little girls were on their way to Sunday school when they were approached by a strange man, who told them that he had a little girl who would like to go with them. With this as a pretext, the stranger persuaded the girls to accompany him.

Sloat, it is said, taught school at one time in a rural district on the Santiam river in this county, and attended Willamette university here.

Sloat's connection with the Salem crime was established by Chief of Police Verden Moffitt, who made several trips to Albany after learning of the charge upon which the man is held in the Linn county jail, which tallied closely with the details of the Salem case.

As soon as possible Sloat will be confronted by another little Salem girl who was annoyed by a strange man about 18 months ago and in whose case the same tactics were employed as in the latter case in an attempt to lure her away with him.

Rewards of $1200 were offered for arrest of the man sought for the attacks on the two girls.
