Uniform Vaporization. Complete Combustion.
When you buy gasoline, you are buying power. How much power you get out of a gallon of fuel depends, first, upon the number of heat units it contains, and second, upon how completely these heat units are converted into power.

Automotive engineers will tell you that the ideal motor fuel is the one which contains the maximum number of heat units that can be vaporized rapidly and uniformly in the carburetor, and consumed completely in the cylinders of the engine.
