A BIRTH RATE THAT NEVER DECLINES

By S. E. Kiser
 THE foolish people never seem to learn
 By hearing of the fate of other fools;
 Unwise men still are spending all they earn,
 The reckless go on fooling with edged tools;
 The foolish driver cannot learn to wait,
 But tries to beat the engine to the gate.

WHENEVER ponies run there's someone who
 Walks sadly homeward when the racing's done;
 We hear of someone every day or two
 Who played unwisely with a rusty gun;
 Men keep on taking medicine at night,
 And, after it's too late, turn on the light.

STILL swimmers like to show how brave they are
 By taking chances that they need not take;
 The stranger with the sporty looking car
 Finds girls who venture for adventure's sake;
 Men still establish love nests here and there,
 And think their wives will never know or care.

YOUNG speculators cannot seem to learn
 That miracles are seldom brought about;
 They keep right on expecting to return
 The stolen cash before they get found out,
 And every little while some foolish cove
 Hides all his hard-earned savings in a stove.

THE foolish will not learn by being told,
 The foolishness, it seems, is never checked;
 The fortune teller's palm is crossed with gold,
 The scolding woman's happiness is wrecked;
 If all the fools gained wisdom bit by bit
 The devil soon would close his place and quit.
