FASHION'S REALM

Paris, Sept. 9. — That these late summer days are seeing a revival of transparent hat was shown on the boulevards today in a wide brimmed chapeau entirely transparent, so that the wide leaves and flat flowers on its brim showed prettily against the light. One had a big and soft silk rose placed beneath the brim, over the right ear.

London, Sept. 9.—Something new in capes was shown in shops today even late as it is. The very latest idea is that of a circular overskirt on a frock of heavy silk. It makes the) skirt seem even more full. But if a sudden breeze or a sudden whim arrives—presto change! The heavy silk overskirt may be unfastened in a trice whisked around the shoulders and re-fastened as a cape.

New York, Sept. 9. — There is a tendency today to make sleeves less a costume in themselves, and more an adjunct of the gown which they supposedly adorn. For evening wear, large armholes and no sleeves are suggested. For afternoon wear, the sleeve usually stops just above the elbow though sometimes it is wide enough so that the back of it hangs a little way down the forearm.

New York, Sept. 9.—The new coats that today's damp weather brought out are of a beauty and grace which costume a dangerous rival of the tailored suit even for ordinary street wear. Camel's hair is still in vogue, but it is striped with brown or dark blue plaid. Tweed topcoats are high in favor and decidedly mannish in cut. But the very short coat is the innovation. They fasten with one big button and hang rather full and loose.

BURGESS BEDTIME STORIES

Miserable Little Mr. Smarty

By Thornton W. Burgess

A pity 'tis, but it is true,
The innocent must suffer too.
—Mrs. Reddy.

"Now," said she, "we have got to move, all on your account."

OF ALL the little people in the Green Forest and on the Green Meadows, in the Old Orchard and in the Old Pasture the most miserable was little Mr. Smarty, the young Fox who had tried to show off. You know he had tried to catch one of Jimmy Skunk's children, and that little Skunk had promptly used his little scent gun. For a while little Mr. Smarty rolled and kicked and squealed and cried. He was sure his eyes had been put out, for some of that scent had been thrown right into them.

But by and by he found his eyes were not put out, and as soon as he could see he crawled to his home, which was also the home of his brother and two sisters and father and mother. There in the doorway he lay down and whimpered and cried and rubbed and rubbed his face, and felt very, very sick. He wondered why his brother and sisters didn't come to him and tell him they were sorry for him. He couldn't see well enough to see where they were, so he thought thy must have run away.

They hadn't run away, but they had gone far enough to get fresh pure air, and there they sat looking on and wondering what was going to happen to their foolish little brother. Three very sober and frightened little Foxes they were. They understood now why their mother had warned them to always be polite to a Skunk. Little Mr. Smarty understood this now even better than they did, and he remembered how his mother had told him when he had boasted that he could kill a Skunk that he never would get near enough to do so.

Little Mr. Smarty thought he was as miserable as he possibly could be, but his troubles were not yet over. He longed for his mother to come home, for he felt that somehow she would make things right. But when she did come it was only to make him more miserable than ever.

Mrs. Reddy knew at once what had happened. She didn't have to be told. She knew what had happened long before she reached home, and when she got there she was angrier than those little Foxes had ever been her before. She didn't go very near little Mr. Smarty. She went only near enough to be sure that he heard what she said. My, how her tongue did fly! She told him that he had been served just right. She reminded him how she had warned him about being polite to every Skunk. She said she hoped he had learned a lesson he would never forget. She said she wasn't the least bit sorry for him. Then she pointed out to him how getting into trouble himself had made trouble for all the rest of them.

"Now," said she, "we have got to move, and all on your account. We can't live with such a dreadful smell as this, and it will last for days and days. We've got to go hunt up a new home. It is a pity that people who do wrong and get into trouble should not be the only ones to suffer. But they seldom are. If you hadn't been warned it would be a very different matter and I would be sorry for you. But you were warned and you have no one to blame but yourself. Now go down in that house and stay there for a while."

The little Fox didn't dare disobey. Slowly he dragged himself inside that house. When he had disappeared Mrs. Reddy led the three other little Foxes to an old house she knew of in another part of the Old Pasture. "I hope, my dears," said she, "that you have learned a lesson from your brother."

"We have," cried the three together. "We have and we'll never forget it."

Conscience Hurts; Man Would Return Money State Paid

Salem, Sept. 9.—When George H. Strauchon, now a resident of Seattle, lost his finger while working for himself after hours he probably did not figure that a guilty conscience was going to rise up and smite him because he laid claim to compensation under the Oregon law which provides insurance for men injured in the pursuit of their duties.

Had he so figured there would have been no occasion for the letter of confession received by the state industrial accident commission from Strauchon, Friday. In his letter Strauchon tells of the injury and of his claim under the compensation act. But he also explains that, whereas his claim and compensation were based on an injury received in the course of his duties as an employe of the Northwest shipyard, Portland, in 1917, the loss of his finger was experied while he was engaged in work himself out of hours.

His claim, which totalled $281.66, was paid by the commission. Now Stauchon wants forgiveness and asks how he can square his account with the state.

Preference Given To Alien Workers, Veterans Allege

Astoria, Sept. 9.—Alleging the Port of Astoria gives preference to aliens in employing men and that one now employed there is a slacker, having refused to serve in the military forces during the war by claiming exemption from the draft on the grounds that he was an alien, Edward Young camp, Spanish War Veterans, Thursday night passed a resolution condemning the port commission. Bert Gee and Frank Godfrey, two members of the local camp, were named as a special committee to continue to press the matter before the commission.

Commander Butterfield of Edward Young camp states that the matter has been brought before the port commissioners several times and nothing has been done to change the situation. Butterfield also stated that when the matter of the employment of aliens at the port docks was taken up with pier officials, they asserted they were powerless to act, that it was a matter for the commission to decide.

Interesting Card Put on by Woodmen

All the available boxers in Portland were included in the exhibition bouts put on by Webfoot Camp No. 65, Woodmen of the World, in the Woodmen hall, Tenth and Alder streets, Friday night. Eight three-round engagements furnished the excitement for the 400 or more fans who were invited.

Those who competed were: Tiny Herman vs. Bill Felsen, Sammy Gordon vs. Billy Ryan, Jimmy Sacco vs. Ray Showers and "Spec" Woods, Charley Hellman vs. Bud Oliver, Eddie Richards vs. Jack Stanley, Jack Dillon vs. Billy Gardeau, Fred Griffin vs. Red Callahan. Following the bouts the battlers were tendered a banquet by the Webfooters.

Joe Benjamin who meets Jimmy Sacco in the Portland Municipal Boxing Commission's 10-round main event, billed for the Armory next Friday night, arrived on the scene in time to be introduced between contests at the Woodmen hall and he, as was Jimmy Sacco, was given a big ovation. The long train ride from Los Angeles to Portland was such that Benjamin felt he was in no shape to box Friday night and he was excused.

DRESS

No. 4853

Draping the Evening Gown

A very lovely frock of the type so extensively worn in Paris at present is developed with a long blouse of maize georgette crepe, embroidered all over in small crystal beads, and with a skirt of coral Thais velvet draped upward toward the left hip, where it is fastened under a huge buckle of crystal squares. The drapery at the left falls far below the edge of the skirt in a straight train.

Commission Service To Be Interesting

An especially interesting feature of the meeting of the Congregational Pacific missionary board will be the commission service for Miss Alice Gwinn, who is on her way to Kyoto, Japan, where she will teach in the Doshisha the coming year.

The commission will be given by Dr. Edward Lincoln Smith of Seattle and Mrs. Helen Street Ranney will make the consecration prayer. Miss Gwinn's response will be "Why I Go."

This service will be of great interest, not only because of its spiritual importance, but because Miss Gwinn goes from the state of Washington. Miss Frances Clapp of Oregon is also on the faculty in that school, and the two women from the Northwest in the Doshisha will make our interest there the more keen.
