THE STRICKEN NATION. A Startling Pamphlet Sent Around the Capitol.

Washington, Jan. 14 .- A startling looking pamphlet was sent around the capital to-day. It was entitled "The Stricken Nation," and recounted the terrible fate of the country at the hands of the malignant Britishers in the year 1893. The story is intended as an awful warning to congress on the subject of coast defences. The front of the book is devoted to queer and vivid pictures of the destruction of New York. In the foreground a very demoralized statue of Liberty, armless and tottering, looks out despairingly on every ship that passes by. And there is a number of sheets of flame, while New York city from the apex. The building itself has Supplemental petitions against the been turned completely around by the

THE INDIAN SITUATION.

Present Condition of Affairs at Pine

Washington, Jan. 16 .- The commissioner of Indian affairs to-day received from Mrs. Goodall, supervisor of education at Pine Ridge, a report on the battle on Wounded Knee. She says her information is chiefly from the Indian prisoners engaged in it, and persons who afterward visited the scene. The survivors of Big Foot's band are unanimous in the statement that the Indians did not deliberately plan the resistance. The demand for their arms was a surprise to the Indians. But a great majority chose to submit quietly. Some had already been searched and a large number of guns, knives and hatchets confiscated. When the searching of the persons of the men began, the women say they too were searched and their knives which they alway carry for household purposes, were taken from them. A number of men surrendered their rifles and cartridge belts, when one young man, described by the Iudians as a good-fornothing young fellow fired a single shot. This called for a volley from the troops and the firing and confusion became
