John Booth.

The name of John Boooh has become as familiar to the readers of the CHRON-ICLE as that of William McKinley. The reason is John Booth believes in printer's ink. The reason is John Booth finds that printer's ink pays. John has proved it and the proof of the pudding is the eating. Three years ago John started a little one horse green grocery store in partnership with John Kirby.

NOTES ABOUT WEATHER VANES. Carved Wooden Vanes Went Out with

Figureheads in Ships. When the Phoenician sailor stuck a needle through the stem of a feather and snips, and carrots, and cabbage, and held it out in the wind, he invented the onions, and beets, and turnips, and first weather vane, or feather vane. He was nearly equaled by the Indian boy, who was taught to moisten his finger in his mouth and to hold that finger aloft in the air. When that finger grew cold on a certain side the Indian child knew that the wind came from that particular direction. The Phœnicians, however, were probably the first of all civilized peoples to put the vane of feather into practical use.

Since those early days weather vanes have been used in every form and by all races. Modern vanes in their present shapes were first made of wood by traveling carvers and later. on poles, churches, public buildings, ships and were placed on rocky points of land along the seashore. They are now made in every conceivable design and pattern. Horses, cows, deer, eagles, ships, roosters and even pigs are hammered out in copper and used to register the direction of the wind.

The newer vanes have rain cups attached for catching water during a storm. The amount of water that falls is measured by the square inch in a tube under the vane. Wind gauges also are attached. These indicate the speed of the wind. The gauges are small cups hung sideways to the vane. The wind blows them around in a circle and the revolutions are registered by electricity. Nearly all the large weather vanes in town are connected with dials in the buildings below.

The dial is round, like the face of a clock, lettered like a compass, and a revolving hand shows the action of the wind on the vane overhead. Vanes are no longer set in sockets, as it is nearly impossible to keep them properly oiled. They are hung loosely, like a cap on a pivot, and the hollow stem of the vane hangs over the head of the pivot, covering it from rain and rust.

One of the largest vanes ever seen in New York was placed on the postoffice about fifteen years ago. It was so large that it was considered unsafe and was taken down. A good drawing of it is still in existence. The arrow, scroll and banneret seent to be the favorite shapes in vanes at present. The fence jumping grounds where country fairs are held, but they are not in great demand. The tobacco leaf vane is found largely in the south and in Connecticut. The spread eagle and running deer are wind signs ticularly in Canada. Malt barrels in copper are placed on breweries throughout the country.-New York Recorder.

The History of Tweeds. I had not been many weeks in Edinburgh before one of my friends in the cloth trade wrote me from London in quiring about a "coarse woolen black and white checked stuff, made in Scotland and expected to be wanted for patterns of it. This was easier asked than performed, for at that period shepherds' checks were only made in plaids, or mands with borders and fringes. I, however, contrived to out a small piece from the seam of my brother's cloak and forwarded it. The postage in those days what he wanted, and asked me to forward him half a dozen pieces, but at that time I do not believe there was one piece in all Scotland! I, however, soon got them made, and I believe these were the first Scotch tweeds that were sent to London in bulk. My friend was in a position to introduce them into influential quarters, which he did successfully. Increased orders followed rapidly, and he and the firm I am connected with had almost a monopoly of the trade in London in these goods for a considerable time.-Border Advertiser.

The cleverest take of the new year comes from Tacoma, in the shape of a column article in a newspaper about the establishment of a "goose" cannery in Alaska. The geese at the mouth of the Yukon are to be canned in great shape. The story reads well, and will go the

A Preventive for Croup. We want every mother fo know that croup can be prevented. True croup never appears without a warning. The first symptom is hoarseness; then the child appears to have taken a cold or a cold may have accompanied the hoarseness from the start. After that a peculiar rough cough is developed, which is followed by the croup. The time to act is when the child first becomes hourse: a few doses of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy will prevent the attack.
