By a competent girl to do general housework. Apply at this office. 2-19 2t Ivy on Walls.

A friend recently called attention to a case which he thought subverted our view that the ivy growing on walls tended to make them dry rather than damp. On looking at the case we find that the wall was covered with the Ampelopsis veitchii, or, as it is called. Japan ivy, and that the vines had been suffered to grow over the shingle roof of the house some four or five feet from the gable end, and that the spouts and other water conduit were completely choked by this growth of vine and filling up with leaves.

It is no wonder that a house should be damp under such circumstances. It should not be forgotten that the vines on walls must never be allowed to reach the roof or clamber in the gutters, but must be confined entirely to the vertical surface of the walls on which they grow The innumerable number of small rootlets absorbing moisture continually generally make walls so dry and hard that it has been found at times in the Old World, when necessary to take down a Liberty streets. building, almost impossible to do so on account of the extreme hardness of the mortar, which has been kept dry for so many years through the agency of these The case we have referred to roots. shows how often a good idea may be spoiled by reason of the thoughtless manner in which the idea is carried out. -Meehan's Monthly
