Employment For Boys.

There is an institution in Astoria that is doing good work among the boys, and which is not generally known. Rev. Dilworth, of the Presbyterian church, has a class of about fifteen boys, whom has a class of about fifteen boys, whom he is teaching the art of type setting, type writing, scroll sawing, besides some of the sciences. They meet there two or three evening in each week, says the Herald, and occasionally the good ladies of the church serve refreshments and is far better for the boys and keeps them off the streets, and Mr. Dilworth is certainly doing a noble and christian work which will be appreciated. He makes no charges for the service and does it for the benefit of the boys. This is the kind of missionary work that produces good results and Rev. Dilworth's laudable efforts are deserving of success.

Thanksgiving Day in New York City. It used to be that Thanksgiving day in New York was, like the day all over the eastern part of the country, a day which centered around a dinner. This dinner was inevitable, and the families saw each other then that never saw each other in a group at any other time. The prodigal returned for it; the poor relation looked forward to it and praised it as it progressed heavily through its different courses; and the several members of the family tried to be more polite and genial and loving toward one another at that meal than at any other of the three times 365 other meals of the year. There are some who like family dinners, and there are other wicked ones who sympathize with the young woman who assented to having a family dinner by saying, "Yes, and let us have any family but our own!"

It is an awful and solemn ceremony in many homes, and it is made more so, as a rule, by some one of the elder of the members, and telling how pretty they were as children, and how they used to make him tell and retell the old story of the roast pig he stole the night before Gettysburg, with which introduction he promptly tells the old story again.

It may not be so everywhere, but around New York city this has all changed. It is not that the families around the great metropolis love each other less, or that they have less cause or less desire to be thankful, but a great and powerful and fascinating rival has come take the place of the Thanksgiving day dinner, and it is known not only in New York, but from Texas, or wherever else a Yale man is carrying a transit, to Canada, or wherever else the Princeton man is building a bridge, as the Thanksgiving day game.

And now everybody goes out to see Princeton and Yale decide the football championship, and instead of boring each other around a dinner table, grow hoarse and exhausted in shouting for their favorite son or the college of their son .-Harper's Weekly.
