RAILROAD RUMORS.

A paragraph in yesterday's Oregonian refers to the trip taken last Sunday and Monday by General Superintendent McNeil and General Western Freight Agent Campbell of the Union Pacific, in company with M. A. Moody of this city from The Dalles, by way of Dufur and Kingsley to Sherar's Bridge, thence across the Deschutes and through part of Sherman county back to The Dalles, and intimates that these gentlemen were "spying out the land" to ascertain what inducements it offered for a branch line or lines to connect with the Union Pacific. It is generally understood that the Union Pacific has no money to put into branch roads, but if that company expects to control the traffic of the country tributary to The Dalles, something in the way suggested must be done in the near future. If the Union Pacific does not build one or more lines into the interior some other company will and in the latter event, with an open river to Portland, the grain and wool traffic of this great section of country would be lost to the Union Pacific, perhaps forever. While THE CHRONICLE is not particularly fascinated with anything that the Union Pacific is likely to do, it will hail with pleasure any movement likely to give the interior railroad connection with the Columbia river. Meanwhile this "spying out the land," if it means another railroad, affords a further proof, if more were needed, that the Regulator has stirred up the dormant energies of the Union Pacific more than anything that ever happened since that company got control of the old O. R. & N. Co.'s line.

So far as the foreign market is concerned if all raw materials were free the United States' manufacturer would not be in one whit better position to capture the markets of the world than he is at present. Under the drawback provisions of the McKinley law all materials are practically free when the manufactured article is exported. Thus ninety-nine per cent of the duty paid by the manufacturer on the wool of which an article is made in whole or in part, is paid back to the manufacturer when the article is exported. To this extent all raw materials are free to the exporter. If in any case American products cost more than foreign ones, the higher price paid for American labor is alone responsible. Raw cotton is absolutely free, yet we import more manufactured cotton than we export. The same is true of manufactures of silk, paper stock and hides, the raw material of which is likewise absolutely free. To capture the markets of the world on any extensive scale, it is not free raw materials that we need, but lower wages for the American workman.

A Paris contemporary states that during the past year no fewer than ninety-seven thousand persons died in France of sheer hunger and that the number of crimes adjudicated upon in the courts was 247,000. If we add to this a statement put forward by M. Betham Edwards some time ago, that in Paris, one out of every twenty deaths of adult males is that of a suicide, and then remember the cool bravado of the dynamiter Ravachol who gloried in the commission of the highest crime known to the law while supported by an undoubted wide-spread public sympathy, it will not be difficult to arrive at the conclusion that this hot-souled race is clearly ripe for another scene of blood that may rival the revolution of '98.

Is it possible that nothing can be found to preserve the simplicity of the rural American statesman. We were told when Jerry Simpson entered upon the high duties of his office as a national legislator, that he was a sockless, one suspender statesman, and that the English language wept when he used it. Now he flashes out in a dude suit of store clothes, eats with a fork, and whoops it about Washington on a safety bicycle.

The house judiciary committee has decided to report a resolution directing an investigation to be made into the Pinkerton system. The committee came to this conclusion because of the alleged use of Pinkerton men by inter-state commerce carriers and also because it was alleged their employment resulted in violence to persons and property.
