The Beauty of Morning.

For the Fall Trade Those who linger in bed these autumn mornings, lose some of the creator's best work. The bracing coolness of the air, the stillness that is everywhere in the early morning, are something that the remainder of the day cannot reproduce. The sleepy-eyed soon become wide awake as they drink in the morning air and gaze on the sun as it rises over the Ready-Made Clothing, gorge at the dalles and lights up the Klickitat hills. The sunshine and shadows on these beautiful mountains fade into one another in a way that nature defies art to reproduce. Mt. Adams and Mt. Hood push their heads through the chinging clouds and all the valley is filled with sunlight. No prettier picture is needed to charm the soul, and it must have been at The Dalles that Longfellow stood when he said, "I stood upon the hills when heaven's wide arch was glorious with the sun's returning march."

The Coming Fair.

Things are not being rushed at the fair grounds, for there is little to be done by way of preparation for the coming installment of the new season's fabrics, and invite the fair. The track is in excellent condition and a few repairs to some of the stands and the fence, in places, along the track seems all that needs to be done. Several horses are in active training, and more will arrive continually from now till fair time. We hope to chronicle a most successful meeting and that in spite of hard times, early rains and the price of wheat Eastern Oregon was able

It is hardly probable that any transcontinental line will start in and build a railroad a hundred miles long from The Dalles along the sparsely settled country to the interior. The Union Pacific would not be suspected of doing such a thing any way soon, and any other transcontinental would have to get here first.

The unusual early rains and cold weather have caused young blood to tingle with the thought of an early winter. We heard two young men laying plans to build a bob sled that would pass everything on the road. It's a little proverbs about the "early bird," "a Price 50 cts.
