SATURDAY, DEC. 2, 1893. DEMOCRATIC INCONSISTENCIES.

EDITOR CHRONICLE—Inasmuch as the democratic party of the nation in its platform of 1892 has denounced republican protection as "a fraud and a robbery of the great majority of the American people for the benefit of the few,"

and that "the federal government has no constitutional power to enact such a law," and that "the McKinley tariff law was the culminating atrocity of class legislation," and inasmuch as the ways and means committee is formulating a tariff act to be reported at the coming session of congress, free from unconstitutional provision, their action is a legitimate subject for criticism.

The orators of the democratic party profess to be guided by the principles of their predecessors, and especially the doctrines of Jefferson and Jackson, and hence it becomes a fair matter of inquiry how far the democracy has been faithful to the principles of their distinguished apostles.

As Don Quixote charged full tilt on a flock of sheep, enchanted into Alifanaron, Lord of Taprobana, so did the Quixotic democrat of the national convention charge with fury against the McKinley law, because, amongst other things, it afforded protection to wool, coal, lead and other articles, and they followed in the footsteps of the eccentric John Randolph, who is reported to have said he would go twenty yards out of his way to kick a sheep.

Let us see how General Washington, who had the proud title of "the father of his country," regarded the constitutional question repudiated by the national democracy in the aforesaid platform: The first act of congress passed after the adoption of the constitution was an act to provide for the manner of taking the oaths of office at the beginning of the government.

The second law for its title the following words: "Whereas, it is necessary for the support of government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures that the duties be laid on goods, wares and merchandise imported, be it enacted, etc., etc." Washington wore a coat of domestic cloth on the day of his inauguration, thus giving an object lesson to the legislators of after times as to the means of promoting our national prosperity.

Fresh from the national convention, can any one not blinded by party bigotry believe that Washington would have signed the bill if he had any doubt about its constitutionality? In his second annual message Thomas Jefferson, to whom the democratic orators refer as proof of the orthodoxy of their political sentiments, stated his views as follows: "To foster our fisheries as nurseries of navigation for the nurture of man and protect the manufactures adapted to our circumstances."

"By continuing to make these the rule of our action we shall endure to our countrymen the true principles of their constitution and promote a union of sentiment and of action equally auspicious to their happiness and safety," thus affirming the constitutionality of a tariff.

quires me to say that should you be the advocate of a measure to which our interest is evidently opposed, the zeal with which you have hitherto supported will be relaxed."

To which the general replied: "You ask my opinion on the tariff. I answer I am in favor of a judicious examination and revision of it, and so far as the tariff before us embraces the design of fostering, protecting and preserving within ourselves the means of national defense and independence, particularly within the state of war, I would advocate and support it."

These were the outspoken words of General Jackson, in favor of the protection principle. Under the protection principles embraced in the tariff of 1820, 1824 and 1828 manufacturers flourished and the public debt was rapidly diminished.
