A DIVERSION FROM POLITICS.

How the Horse is Abused and Ruined by Thoughtless Farmers.

OREGON, May 17, 1894.

EDITOR CHRONICLE—In these times of political discussion, when each side is proving from statistics that their solution of the problems capital, labor and hard times is the correct one; if their particular candidate is placed in office confidence will be restored and prosperity sure to follow, while if the other side gain the victory, the country is ruined; when the brain is overtaxed trying to follow each side and find out which is right, I think a little respite would be beneficial.

The first six months of a colt's life is generally pretty comfortable. As he follows his dam in the pasture what in nature can surpass the beauty of a well-bred colt as it courses in playful gambol and seems to spurn the earth it treads upon?

him that he is not doing very well and wonders what is the matter. He has not grown any since he weaned him. He takes Jones out to the straw stack and there stands the colt over by the fence, his back arched, hair standing on end, hide drawn tightly over his bones and covered with scars from the teeth of his stronger companions.

Thus spring passes, turning him out when he can go no longer and hitching him up when he recuperates a little. He is then sent to the timber, probably to pasture for the summer, and caught up again to put on a header wagon and afterwards in a four-horse team to haul grain to market.
