The United States grand jury Monday indicted John Hawthorne on two counts, charging him with murder in the first degree for killing Karpolis, an Indian policeman on the Warm Springs reservation, June 10, 1894.

A. M. Williams & Co. have one of the prettiest handkerchief displays we have ever seen. It is a canopy from which a bell is suspended, and it looks like getting married. Some 1,500 handkerchiefs are used in the decorations.

The United States grand jury yesterday returned not a true bill in the case of Gibbons, Klein and Savage, charged with robbing the mails here. Klein was taken from Salem to Portland to testify, but the jury did not think his testimony sufficient to warrant an indictment.

Justice Davis yesterday decided the case against Dr. Dietrich in his favor virtually holding that the certificate issued by the board of medical examiners was sufficient, and that when they certified as to his qualifications to practice, that certificate could not be limited as to time.

Yesterday the papers in a civil suit brought by Mr. Green against Constable Urquhart were filed in Justice Davis' court. The action is brought to recover damages for the taking and selling of some personal property by the constable in his official capacity. The trial of the case is set for Saturday.

The literary society last evening discussed and settled the question whether or not the liberty of the press should be restricted. The speakers on the affirmative were Roger Sinnott and Clara Story and those on the negative were Nona Ruch and Fred Wilson. In the absence of the president, Truman Butler, the vice president, Miss Etta Story, presided. Miss Nona Ruch was elected secretary to fill a vacancy. As so many of the members are busy with Christmas duties the society adjourned till the first Monday in January, when it expects to see all its members present.

By W. C. Curtis, pastor of the Congregational church, at the residence of C. F. Lay, in this city, Tuesday, Dec. 18th, Alfred C. Carlisle, of St. Louis, Mo., and Miss Emma E. Lay, of The Dalles.

The happy couple left for Portland this afternoon, and from there will go to St. Louis.

ABOUT LITTLE PHIL.

AND HIS CONNECTION WITH AN INDIAN UPRISING.

Sheridan's Blockhouse, on the Columbia and the Events Which Led to Its Construction.

Sheridan's blockhouse, opposite Cascade Locks, Or., on the Columbia river, has tumbled down, its heavy, hand-hewn timbers, relics of stormy days in the northwest country, still sound save a few near the foundations, have been utilized by the vandal fishermen to build fishways, until the old river, scandalized by the desecration, swept them all away during the great flood of this summer, and now nothing remains to mark the old stronghold of the pioneer but a few moss-grown and rotten timbers.

An incident in the early history of Gen. (then lieutenant) Phil Sheridan is recalled by the ruins of this old building, which is thus related by the veteran river pilot, Capt. J. McNulty, who fought the Indians here as a volunteer during the campaign of 1856, with "Little Phil," and who is yet making regular trips as a pilot on the middle Columbia.

The "fishing Indians," mostly Wascos, Snakes and Cascades, with renegades from many other tribes, a regular hotch-potch of "Siwash," whose love of the succulent salmon was greater than tribal ties, and whose lodges lined the river near the spearing rocks at the falls and cascades, had long been turbulent and aggressive, but had made no serious outbreak until March 25, 1856. On that day a band of them attacked Brown's mill, situated just above Cascade Locks, on the north, now Washington side, killing and horribly mutilating Mr. Brown and his wife. The other white living at the mill, together with the captain and crew of a little river steamer, the Mary, then tied up at the landing, had gone several miles up the river for the day, leaving only the engineer, Buck Minster, and a small boy named Jimmie Watkins, on board. Luckily for these, there was a little fire banked under the boilers.

The attack was so sudden, that before Minster could realize the danger the Indians were upon him. The foremost reached the shore end of the gang plank as he hid the other, to draw it aboard. A quick shot from his pistol sent the red man headlong into the river. The plank was drawn in, while the boy cut the shore line, and the little Mary began drifting at once, under a hail of bullets and arrows, from one great danger into another—that of the terrible current above the rapids.

Sending the boy to the wheel, Minster threw everything inflammable within reach into the furnace—some bacon, oil, and even furniture—and made steam enough for headway, the boy, under orders, making for an eddy behind an island near the head of the rapids, out of reach of the Indians. The little fellow had proven himself a real hero, for in going to the wheel he had been exposed freely to hostile bullets, one striking him in the leg, but he crawled manfully to his post and saved the boat.

As soon as full steam could be made the steamer was headed across the river to Atwells, where alarm was given of the outbreak. Messengers were sent to Fort Dalles and Fort Vancouver. From the former Col. Wright came to the rescue with a company of U. S. troops, while Lieut. Phil Sheridan, with a troop from Fort Vancouver, embarked on the Steamer Belle, bringing one cannon. Landing at Lower Cascades, he was quickly on the ground and rounded up a number of the hostiles. A company of volunteers from the Willamette Valley came on the boat Jennie Clark, piloted by Capt. McNulty. The troops soon subdued the Indians, but not before a dozen or more whites had been killed. Nine Indians were hung near the smoking ruins of Brown's mill. The officers decided then to build a block-house here for the protection of scattered pioneers, a rallying place for them during later Indian scares.

This was done during the same year, 1856 and it always called Sheridan's, but just why no one seems to know now. A point of rocks on the river a short distance from the rapids, is also called Sheridan's point. Soon the last of the pioneers will have passed away, as has this, their moss-covered old log stronghold, and little incidents like Jimmie Watkins heroism and even Sheridan's prompt trip, too trivial to be noted in history, will have been lost save for dim tradition. So it may be well to give one passing moment to the old blockhouse that nestled for so many years under the shadow of the House-Mountain, itself the scene of one of the strangest Indian legends of the northwest country.—George P. Morgan, in Chicago Blade.

Oh Those Dreadful Trusts.

Monday night the ice on the lower lake was so treacherous that the faith of a couple of young ladies skating thereon was broken all to smash. With confidence worthy of a nobler cause the sweet, glowing girls glided and skimmed over the surface of the lake, and just as they were beginning to feel that their little heels were shod with the wings of Mercury, a couple of female shrieks fairly shivered the cold starlight, and everybody saw that each of the beauties had put her foot in it almost up to her chin! Girls, don't trust the ice—don't trust anything too much. I tell you the trusts are busting the whole country and making populists of us all. Klamath Star.
