THERE WILL BE NO WAR.

Affairs down in Washington are pretty well stirred up, considering congress is not in session. Gresham in his capacity of court jester, manages to keep the time from hanging heavily on the hands of the president. Gresham, however, although he makes an excellent court fool, it must be remembered is at least a professional fool, or rather a fool by profession, while there are some other persons in that village who outclass him, although but amateurs. One of these, and the leading one, is the ass that gets up the dispatches sent in his name to the newspapers of this coast. We read in the Sun of yesterday a long column-filler about the way in which "Europe is laughing at us," and some profound prophecies as to the amount of trouble we are going to have with foreign nations. The same fellow tells us we are way down on the list as concerns our navy, and that our naval officers are blushing for us. Besides this there is any quantity of the same kind of rot, gathered by a colony of asses, and compiled by one.

As a matter of fact, the complications this government has with others are every-day affairs that are easily and amicably settled. Our navy, while surpassed by that of both England and France, is not to be laughed at by either, and as to our naval officers being ashamed of their ships, if there are any such, it is those "carpet knights" whose "pull" permits them to put in their time in society circles in Washington, instead of treading the deck of a man of war. This is a nation of peace, not of war. It seeks no quarrels with its neighbors, but it is afraid of none of them. This nation, with 70,000,000, has no more fear of England than it had when with 5,000,000 she declared her independence of her. That any of the great countries of Europe could do us great harm, is conceded; but it is quite certain that in the end the bill of damages would be presented to them in such shape that it would be paid.

As for Spain, and the idle talk concerning what she could or would do with us, it is only necessary to call attention to the fact that she has her hands full at home trying to control her own population. The moment Spain snaps her fingers she loses Cuba forever. As it is just now, her own people are in rebellion in that interesting island, and are at least keeping the flies from bothering the home government.

As for England, it is not probable that circumstances will ever arise that will cause war between her and the United States. There is a common tongue that will be that of the world ere long, a similarity of ideas, and a common interest in each other's welfare that is founded upon and cemented by a vast business partnership. England's interests and ours are mixed and mingled, until they are no longer capable of segregation. With Germany we're in somewhat the same condition, and all Europe is so balanced against itself that none of the parts could safely tackle a job like that of undertaking to humble this country. However, should England attack us Russia would find time to settle the Korean matter, and incidentally some other little affairs (down India-wards. Should Germany try it, some of her new possessions on the Rhine might be lost to her. Spain would lose Cuba, and any one, or all of them would have a contract on their hands they would be glad to sub-let before they were through with it. The United States is too powerful and too large to be attacked, and besides, none of the nations named could quarrel with her without being hurt in that tenderest of all national spots, the pocket.

The six-dollar-a-week newsgatherer at Washington may set all the countries by the ears, but it will only be on paper; outside of that he couldn't set a hen.

TOWARDS ANARCHY.

Yesterday United States Judge Gilbert appointed John M. Egan receiver of the Oregon Short Line. The appointment is ill-timed, and will serve to strengthen the idea already unfortunately too prevalent, that the United States courts will do almost anything that railroads want them to. For Judge Gilbert we have the profoundest respect. We look upon him as being both an ideal man and an ideal judge; and yet the fact remains that the appointment is an unfortunate one. The same day that Egan was made receiver of the Short Line another man addressed a large audience in Portland on the subject of the railroad strikes in Chicago last July. That man was Eugene V. Debs, the president of the American Railway Union. Last July the men, of whom Debs was the leader, came in conflict with the railroad managers, of whom Egan was the leader. Troops were called out, the rioters (whom it is pretty conclusively established were Egan's hired men) were dispersed, and Debs and those in authority with him in the labor movement, were arrested for contempt of court, and, without a trial, were sentenced by the United States judge, Debs to six, and the others to three months in jail. Debs was also, with his fellows, indicted for conspiracy, and after the prosecution had adduced all its testimony, one of the jurors taking sick, the case was gladly dismissed. The United States judge at that time said that Egan and his fellow-conspirators should be indicted also—but they were not.

Fullman, over whose greed the whole trouble occurred, was subpoenaed as a witness by that same United States judge—Grosceup, and when he snapped his fingers at the court and the marshal, and went down to Florida, that same United States judge swallowed the contempt and seemed to like it. Then Egan and the other railroad managers entered into a conspiracy to break the American Railway Union, and to use any means to that end, is probably capable of demonstration, if the matter were permitted by the United States courts to be heard.

Instead of Egan being sent to jail, he is rewarded with an appointment as an agent of the government and of the United States courts. We do not question Judge Gilbert's motives in making the appointment, as it was probably the desire of the stockholders of the road; but still the appointment was an illy-selected one, for instead of being an agent of the court, Egan should at least be brought to trial before it. Behind such appointments lurks the blood-red shadow of anarchy, and that shadow the United States courts are doing their utmost to hammer into substance.

We congratulate our contemporary, the La Grande Chronicle, on its increased size. It is now a six column paper, and all good live columns too.
