EXTRA SESSION TALK.

The extra session project died an early death, and the mourning throughout the state will be confined to a few politicians whose efforts to secure certain concessions which would give them greater power, are frustrated. The people at large are willing to let well enough alone and even compassion for the hard-working political ringsters, who are so sorely disappointed, will not move them to sanction the convening of the legislature. The belief is becoming general that Joe Simon and his friends had some job they wished to get through the legislature, and the following from the East Oregonian gives what is probably the inwardness of the matter:

"A gentleman who has been mingling with the political managers in Portland has some vigorous things to say on the subject of an extra session of the legislature, the calling of which is being advocated by the Portland Oregonian and some of the state papers. The Oregonian has openly made request of Governor Lord that he call the session, and, since it has learned that the governor has made up his mind not to call the session, the paper has indulged in some sharp rebukes to his excellency, the chief executive of the state of Oregon. It appears to be the element in Portland headed by Joe Simon that is making the request for a special session. And it is understood that the chief thing desired is the passage of the Portland charter bill, which Mr. Simon brought into the legislature last session and the legislators turned down. This charter was an absolute necessity, so well informed men say, to Joe Simon's maintaining his supremacy in Portland and Oregon, and it is yet a necessity. The Hume and Hall factions in Portland have made such progress that Mr. Simon must do something to check them. The charter bill will do this. Ordinarily, it would be impertinence for the people in other cities to take a hand in what appears to be a local fight. But, inasmuch as Portland is Oregon's metropolis, and to such a large extent dominates the politics of the state and now asks the people to pay for an extra session to handle its affairs, the people at large are justified in taking more than a passing interest in the contest."

THE REED MOVEMENT.

The Reed movement in New England, which has begun to take practical shape, was expected as a matter of course. The speaker, says the Globe-Democrat, is the biggest man whom New England has had since Blaine's days of promises, and Blaine was the greatest man in his locality since Webster. Blaine was a much greater politician than Webster, though far below him in some other particulars, for Webster never obtained the presidential nomination of his united party. Webster had even greater ill-fortune in this respect than John Sherman has ever suffered. The delegates whom he supposed would be his were more elusive, when the voting time came, than those "pledged" to Sherman. Blaine, however, was not fooled in this way. Most of the delegates who promised to support him always stuck. The probability is that Reed will be equally fortunate.

Presidential booms are usually launched about this time. The Republican National convention is only five months away, and the selection of delegates will soon begin to be a matter of immediate concern. "Demonstrations" in the interest of the different aspirants are now in order. Reed, McKinley, Harrison and Allison "conclaves," "conspiracies" and "rallies" may be looked for frequently now until the convention meets. Everybody who has any preference at all in the matter of the selection of the candidate will soon begin to show it. The liberty of choice is not often wider than it is in the present case. This liberty relates to locality as well as to the general attributes of the aspirants. The far East, the far West and the central West are represented by the candidates, while the divergencies in temperament and characteristics among them are equally conspicuous.

Speaker Reed is in a peculiarly trying position for a presidential aspirant. To a man of his positive character and immense influence the speakership carries with it the leadership of his party in the house. For every partisan measure which is reported by any of the committees he will be held responsible. The tariff bill now before the senate is called the Dingley bill, but the people will consider it a Reed measure, and mete out praise or blame to him according as they divide on that measure's merits. He will be prominently in the foreground until long after the convention has done its work, while his chief rivals, McKinley and Harrison, in private station, can keep in the shadow. Even Allison is far less conspicuously visible, for he is not a leader, and his branch is not likely to be the scene this year of any contest which will bring him into especial prominence. The speaker stands a chance to either make or mar his political fortunes in the next five months. Thus far, however, in the session he has undoubtedly strengthened his hold on his party.

Pendleton's Point of View.

A good-natured rivalry has sprung up between Pendleton and The Dalles regarding their commercial advantages and growth. The following article from the Pendleton Tribune gives that paper's views upon this question and its loyalty to Pendleton is commended. However, the statement made by THE CHRONICLE that $900,000 was paid into The Dalles for wool during the past season is approximately correct, and for the number of pounds 6,000,000 is a much more correct estimate than the 5,000,000 allowed by the Tribune. The price paid per pound here ranged in some instances over 12 cents, while large quantities sold for 11. In Pendleton the prices ranged much lower. We envy Pendleton her woolen mill and scouring mill, but The Dalles will not concede that Pendleton surpasses her as being the wool emporium of the West. All the more reason why woolen manufactures should be established here, where the natural product is at our door and transportation rates, by reason of an open river, so cheap. Here are the Tribune's remarks:

In another column will be found an interesting article from The Dalles Chronicle under the caption, "Time to Advance," wherein the opinions expressed by commercial travelers concerning the leading towns in Oregon are referred to, supplemented by a deserved tribute to Pendleton, which is acknowledged by The Dalles paper to be a "lusty rival."

THE CHRONICLE says that for wool alone $900,000 was disbursed by The Dalles banks last summer.

The Tribune is willing to admit that The Dalles leads as the wool market of Eastern Oregon, but is inclined to believe that the figures quoted above are too high.

Conservative estimates place the amount of wool handled at The Dalles at about 5,000,000 pounds. This is in excess of the number of pounds shipped from Pendleton last year by about one million.

It should be borne in mind, however, that while The Dalles for years past has led as the great wool center, the number of pounds handled at this point previous to the establishment of the scouring mill, less than two years ago, never exceeded a million and a quarter.

A "lusty rival?" It would seem so, when it is known that not until last year has it become generally known to the people of Eastern Oregon, that the fierce competition existing between local buyers combined with the other advantages she possesses, Pendleton easily leads as the most advantageous shipping point for the wool men of the Inland Empire.

It is now confidently expected that during the present year Pendleton will handle over 6,000,000 pounds of wool, nor will she then have arrived at the zenith of her possibilities as the great entrepot of the wool product of Eastern Oregon.

The people of Pendleton are deserving of the enviable reputation they enjoy as reliable and enterprising business men, who never fail to contribute toward any scheme calculated to benefit their town, but the fact should not be lost sight of that nature has done much for Pendleton, and that it is to her natural resources that the people of this city are largely indebted for the city's rapid strides to the goal of her ambition—the ideal inland city of the state—leading all others as a commercial and manufacturing center.
