THE GREAT CRIME OF 1896.

Since the free silver coinage agitation began and the people have talked, written and published tons of matter about silver and its coinage, the advocates of free and unlimited coinage have been incessant in their denunciation of "the great crime of 1873" and "demonetization of silver." That "great crime" consisted in the representatives of the people passing an act codifying all previous laws relating to coinage, and, in the list of coins, omitted, or, as it is sometimes said, dropped, but by the free silver advocates demonetized, the silver dollar. They adopted this latter term probably because it is a long word and can be used indefinitely to indicate the demonetization of silver entirely; which has never been done. Silver has been coined continuously from the establishment of the mint down to the present time.

Has anybody ever heard a free silver advocate in speech or in print denounce Thomas Jefferson for discontinuing the coinage of silver dollars in 1896, inquires an exchange? Under that order not a single silver dollar was coined for thirty-four years. That order was issued, not by any special authority of an act of congress, but by the fiat of Mr. Jefferson, through James Madison, his secretary of state.

Now, it is a pertinent question to ask those who prate of "the great crime of 1873," whether that act was any greater crime than that of Mr. Jefferson in 1896? Jefferson and Madison were distinguished among the most able statesmen of the revolutionary fathers, the latter having been prominent among the framers of the constitution of the nation. Think you that Jefferson and Madison had a suspicion they had committed a great crime against the people and their country, and that posterity would, when an act was lawfully passed by the representatives in congress effecting the same thing which had been done 67 years before, declare that act "the great crime of the century?"

If that act was a great crime in 1873 it was no less a crime in 1896, and those sterling patriots and statesmen are more deserving denunciations because they set a precedent which congress followed.

It is also remarkable and worthy of the attention of all who delight in anathematizing those who voted for that act as criminals, that during the ensuing 34 years following the order of Mr. Jefferson's secretary discontinuing the coinage of silver dollars, in all the discussions in congress on the subject of coinage, not one in congress or out of congress, is known to have denounced that act as a "great crime," or even objected to it. It caused no popular storm to sweep over the country demanding the remonetization and coinage of the neglected silver dollar to disturb the stability of business and the peace of the people. Panics came and went during all that period of 34 years and nobody attributed them and their attending distress to any great crime which Mr. Jefferson had committed by his order stopping the coinage of the silver dollar, which his successors failed to discover.

Twenty-three years after the passage of the act of 1873, people speak glibly of the "great crime" who have little conception of the "crime" of which they prate, or if they do it is for purposes of deception for selfish motives. They have neither the interest of truth or the people in view. Millions have grown into manhood since 1873 and millions who have attained that age were then unborn; these have little or no true personal understanding of the condition of the country when the "great crime" was committed.
