A BIRD HOSPITAL.

The Feathered Patients of a Queer Boston Institution.

Parrots Predominate and Keep the Place in an Uproar with Their Prattle—Smart Sayings of the Saucy Creatures.

"Doncher wantter, doncher wantter?" was the quick interrogative, and—"Don't I want to what?" was the equally quick reply. "Why, doncher wantter kiss me, you fool!" shouted the parrot.

The sharp eyes of the parrot for a minute were downcast. He studied the sand in the bottom of the cage, but perking his head erect, summoned courage and said in a doubtful way: "Well, I don't know."

Few persons know that there is a bird hospital in Boston in Mount Vernon street, and few know how interesting birds are until they visit the convalescent ones in their boarding house.

In the ward of the hospital there was a colony of aristocratic birds from the Back Bay and Brookline housed for the summer. Their mistresses had gone off to the seashore or mountains, and some had crossed to the old world, but their feathered pets were summering in the West End, lest by change of atmosphere the tiny things contract asthma or bronchitis, for birds, have lungs, and very delicate ones, too, and while in days gone by, like the babies of the slums, it was the survival of the fittest, to-day they are sent to a bird physician, who, by treatment, restores vitality to the featherless flesh and sends the warbler back to its home as fat as butter, with its plumage as yellow as gold.

The bird hospital on Mount Vernon street has existed for five years, and some of the birds there have been willed to the keeper of the birds' boarding house with a fund sufficient to maintain them during their "mortal sojourn," as the aged preacher would say. There are 60 of them housed in comfort, and by spending an hour among them one learns many of their curious ways.

Some of the canaries have bells hanging in their cages, and one of them has the habit of telling everyone about that he is cross by pulling the bell. The more ferocious he feels to his fellow-birds and his mistress the harder he tugs away at the bell.

But there is another kind of "bell," and this time it is spelled "belle." They call her "Juliet," for she is such an unconscionable flirt; indeed, some of the more prudent birds whisper more awful names than that about her character, for wherever Juliet goes a half-dozen or more of her male admirers follow her, and she has caused considerable jealous feeling in at least one bird colony, and she's quite a young one, too. Her imprudence has been the cause of several changes in her domain lately. She has even been confined to a solitary cell as a means of discipline.

"Doody," another parrot, sings a curious ditty, conspicuous for its want of rhythm, but he enjoys it and laughs heartily over his production of "Doody, Doody, puddin' and pie; when the girls come out to play, Doody, Doody runs away."

The letter "r" in girls bothers his vocal organs, and while he is trying to sing it he twirls it out as if it were the smoke from a cigar, until his falsetto tones are piped so high that he loses himself and bursts forth in a peal of laughter intensely suggestive, and then goes on with his story.

There are canaries by the dozen, and rated at all prices; paroquets and paroquettes, mule birds, which indicate their name to perfection by their stubbornness, and a beautiful Virginia nightingale, which every traveler in the south would recognize as the little fellow that sings after dark in the rice fields of his native state but is still as a mouse by day.

"Tippie," one of the merriest and most active of the paroquets, is constantly singing: "I'm a quiet little Tippie," even though the people about him declare he is not.

The parrots, of course, claim all attention, because of their ability to express language, and one of them actually recites "Twinkle, twinkle, little star," in very audible tones. The habits of the birds are so much like those of human beings that it is their delight to sit at the window and look out at the passers-by as if they really understood what they saw, and they are so jealous that if one is more petted than another they show their displeasure by flapping their wings against the sides of their cages.

In the matter of bathing there is a great difference with birds. Some just trisk about in their bathtubs, and chirp and sing with delight, and others are too indolent to bathe at all. In the latter case they have to be bathed like babies every day.

All save a couple that had come in during the day for treatment were in splendid condition when the Herald reporter saw them.

The effects of their country home have certainly been beneficial.—Boston Herald.
