THOUSAND AND SECOND TALE

SCHEHEREZADE'S LAST, THAT SETTLED THE SULTAN.

When Haroun Al Raschid, the most glorious of all the illustrious sultans mentioned in the semi-sacred pages of the Zip-Koran; the grandest of all the caliphs, whose illustrious deeds are preserved in the archives of the Bagdad public museum and rendered immortal in tradition. When he, I say, after one thousand and one consecutive nights had fallen asleep as Scheherezade told some new story of love, drawn with the vivid coloring natural to the warm-blooded daughters of Araby the best, and painted in all the glowing imagery of the Orient. When he awoke on the morning of the 1002d day, there were deep circles of blue under each of his illustrious eyes, and his general appearance indicated that his royal naps was a weary of life. The ancient chronicles from which I glean this tale say that he intimated to the tale-teller, Scheherezade, that he desired a new bill.

"By my halidom!" he exclaimed, as he sat up in his couch and extended one rich brown shank over its side until his great toe tapped nervously the genuine Turkish rug. "I am a weary of love. The winds from Kathay, or the cyclones of Kansas, have toyed these many days with the whiskers of those old stories. They need a barber; in fact, all the barbers of Bagdad who have played so important parts in your silly stories would be employed for a year in removing their chin-beards. They are as stale as the cuisine of Limburg, and interminable as the life of Napoleon. Cease! we command thee, thy maudlin babblings of love! Quit whispering through your turban, and offend no longer our auricular drum with the asinine inanities of love lora damsels and male mental juckassi with diseased brains, and hallucinations ascribed to their hearts, but arising from torpid livers. Give us a rest! or give us something new. It has been nearly three years now since I began neglecting my vow, and methinks it is time to order in the bowstring. Bestir your stumps, or by the Pefferian beard of the prophet I will give you the sack to some purpose. I am tired of the comedy of affection and disgusted with the farce of love. Trot us out some opera bouffe, so to speak, as it were, and bring on the ballet. Give us something new." So saying he closed his illustrious and most magnificent mouth with a snap, and not a soft snap either.

As Scheherezade watched him with her gazelle-like eyes, plunge first one mahogany-colored shank and then another into the abyssal depths of his red-flannel bloomers, she realized that the old man was mad clean through. Scheherezade was an up-to-date girl, however, and had proved that she was onto her job. So she turned on her pillow and before his "serene highness" could recover his serenity, a gentle snore with a crescendo movement, announced to him that the lady was afraid neither of his bluff nor a royal flush.

An hour later as the caliph, disguised in a clean turban and new bloomers, was slumming in the white chapel districts of Bagdad, Scheherezade emerged from her boudoir, fresh as a daisy and calm as a country courtship. "I'll do the old man up to the queen's taste, and that my own, tonight," she murmured.

The shades of night had again settled on Bagdad, the streets were dark, for the contract with the electric light company was "busted," and only here and there the gleam of a coal-oil lamp shed a ray of light in the rain and gloom. In the seraglio the shaded lamps threw a soft light over the rich oriental furnishings. Scheherezade was seated on a divan, carelessly sending a delicate thread of smoke from behind her rosebud lips, and at the same time drawing the fragrant vapor into her highly-bred though somewhat retrouse, nasal organ. Haroun, the mighty, had crossed his nether limbs and was resting the fullness of his biking suit on his royal heels. A chibouque, loaded with the fragrant tobacco of Teheran, was in front of him, and he, too, was burning a few pipes to his idol.

"Now then, Zade, old girl," said he, "give us that story. And in order that my subjects may have no doubt but that I shall make the punishment fit the crime, have the grand vizier sent in." This functionary being seated, and the nature of the contest having been explained to him, Scheherezade blew out a cloud of cigarette smoke that had been circulating through the upper story of her system, and half reclining on the divan, began:

ELY'S CREAM BALM is a positive cure. Apply into the nostrils. It is quickly absorbed. 50 cents at Druggists or by mail; samples 10c. by mail. ELY BROTHERS, 66 Warren St., New York City.

The man who eats because he is hungry is, thus far, on the level with the brutes. The man who stops eating the moment his hunger is appeased is the wise man. Nature needs no more food than he calls for. Continued excess brings about indigestion or dyspepsia, with loss of flesh, strength, sleep, ambition and mental power, and an accumulation of aches, pains and many dangerous local maladies. The stomach now can do nothing alone. We must appeal to some artificially digested food which can also digest other foods. That is to say, we must use the Shaker Digestive Cordial. The effect is prompt and cheering. The chronic pain and distress ceases. Appetite presently revives. Flesh and vigor gradually comes back, and the sufferer recovers. But he must be careful in future. A trial bottle for 10 cents.

Laxol is the best medicine for children. Doctors recommend it in place of Castor Oil.
