WASHINGTON, June 14.—A treaty for the annexation of Hawaii to the United States has been signed here, after the return of the president from the present visit to the islands. The treaty has been written and all details agreed upon between the representatives of the two governments, necessary formalities being left for the Senate. There is no doubt that the annexation of Hawaii is the president's acquiescence in the terms of the treaty as it was presented to him. It is now up to Congress to fully analyze it before the Senate.

The treaty is on the general lines of the annexation of the Territory of Hawaii by the United States. It is based on the condition that the United States shall have full and exclusive jurisdiction over the Territory of Hawaii, and it is provided that the president shall have the power to make all the laws necessary and proper for the government and defense of the Territory of Hawaii. The president shall have the power to make all the laws necessary and proper for the government and defense of the Territory of Hawaii.

The treaty is presented by the president to the Senate, and it is provided that the Senate shall have the power to make all the laws necessary and proper for the government and defense of the Territory of Hawaii. The president shall have the power to make all the laws necessary and proper for the government and defense of the Territory of Hawaii.

The treaty is presented by the president to the Senate, and it is provided that the Senate shall have the power to make all the laws necessary and proper for the government and defense of the Territory of Hawaii. The president shall have the power to make all the laws necessary and proper for the government and defense of the Territory of Hawaii.