A PRISMATIC DREAM.

Debs is dreaming a dream from which he is destined to be rudely awakened. In his fancy he sees planted a colony of 300,000 persons, each industrious, sober, happy, contented, having their thinking done by Debs, and all the worry and ills of life transferred from their shoulders to his. Each family will have its little cottage, where the honeysuckle shall send its tendrils clinging around the checkered lattice of the porch, and whose bloom shall make the summer air fragrant with its cloying sweetness. The pink and red hollyhocks will bloom beside the path that leads down to the gate, and there the old-fashioned red roses will delight the eyes and noses of all who come within the gate. The little gardens shall grow apace, and the potato bug and cut worm shall know them not. The broad fields of grain, billowing beneath the kisses of the wind, shall turn to gold untouched by drouth or grasshopper. The Jersey cows and the Ayreshires shall chew their contented cud mid fields of fragrant clover, lulled to rest by droning bees, laden with honey and wax, wending their heavy way home. Fat horses shall munch their corn and hay in well-kept stalls, and the proud Plymouth Rock or Dorking cock shall strut, the lord of an industrious farm. All nature is going to smile, and cockle burrs and thistle will refuse to grow. The spring frosts will come early, and the fall variety late and in mild form.

The 300,000 persons are to be of one mind on every proposition, and even old married folks will agree. None of the 300,000 will become ambitious to be a Debs himself, and everything will be lovely and the goose honk so high that his call will not be heard.

This is only a small portion of his dream, but it suggests the balance. Will it come true? Well, hardly. It will fail from its own inherent weakness. Because it is impossible for finite man to find on the face of the earth 300,000 angels; because the devils of jealousy and selfishness, greed, envy and malice, deceit, falsehood and hate are not yet chained and the millennium is not at hand; because oil and water will not mix; because industry and unthrift will not travel yoke fellows; because all minds are not of the same caliber, and there must be the inevitable clash in the struggle for the survival of the fittest; because a thousand other causes, each of which, alone, would burst the bubble of his dream and leave nothing but the space it occupied.

Mary Ellen Lease says, "The silver issue is dead, and socialism is the hope of the country," and Annie Besant says, "Socialism is the ideal state, but it can never be achieved while man is so selfish." Perhaps theosophy is Mrs. Besant's remedy for all the evils flesh is heir to, but theosophy is apparently, if the term may be applied to things not apparent, too thin for every day use. Bryan says 16 to 1 is the cure all; Weaver thinks, or thought, a currency based upon the products of the country, and issued by the government, would straighten out the tangle; Lubin thinks an export bounty on wheat would make life a joyous round of pleasure. Cleveland, in life, said the gold standard would fix things. McEnery of Louisville says an increase of the tariff on sugar would make the world wag its tail. National arbitration as a patent nostrum is recommended by many as liable to be beneficial, while other many believe in venesection, and think a foreign war would stir up business. The Oregonian thinks if people would work more and talk less, there would be a decided improvement. Now, gentle reader, what do you think?

The Oregonian yesterday did itself proud and surprised most of its readers by giving Bryan's speeches, both at Gladstone Park and Multnomah field, in full. It was something desired by the reading public, no matter what their political beliefs, for most of them were unable to hear Mr. Bryan and desired greatly to know his line of argument. The Oregonian has made this possible, and deserves and has the thanks of the people of Oregon for so doing.

We respectfully suggest as an appropriate, brief and expressive name for those who ride bicycles the short word "Quids," for the old Latin motto says "Quid rides."
