HIS OCCUPATION GONE.

Portland has established a mining exchange, or to be more exact, certain persons have established a mining exchange in Portland. It is unnecessary to go into the matter of the composition of the corporation, for the fact that it is a mining exchange is sufficient condemnation, abundant criticism as to its component parts. It sounds all right, that name of mining exchange, but it means the exchanging of something for nothing, which this exchange immediately starts in to accomplish by asking for a lot of free advertising and free samples of ore (the richer the better) with costs of transportation prepaid.

A mining exchange generally levies tribute on all mines it can get hold of, ties the prospector's property up, and is not patronized by mining men who want to invest. This particular exchange may be different. We, in fact, notice that it promises not to be partial, not to build up one mining region at the expense of another; but, with a true Christian spirit that is more than commendable in that it is adorable, promises to give every district in Oregon, Washington, Idaho and British Columbia a show for its white alley. This is real kind of it, but still there is no immediate danger of the members of the company dying from enlargement of the heart. True, this exchange offers to show the samples sent it free of charge, but this doesn't cost it much.

In San Francisco in stock booming times those who had been bitten were accustomed to paraphrase the old assertion that "Death loves a shining mark" in such a rude way that it became "Death loves a mining shark." The statement, though, remains unproven, for they are as long lived as so many cats, indicating that Death had no use for them, and their principal patron, the prince of sheol, wouldn't give them room lest they get up a corner on his sulphur diggings. Of course the Portland mining exchange may be different, we can't say as to that. Times have changed since we had dealings with that kind of institutions, and the well-known names appended to this company's circular letter ought to be sufficient guaranty as to their character.

We are in a sense glad, however, that this exchange has been opened, for the country needs its mines developed, opened, prospected, and all that was needed was to have a mining exchange that can open the whole job lot with a prospectus and a box of specimens instead of picks, drills and powder. It fills a long-felt want, and will make the life of the hardy prospector one of Sybaritic ease. The historical societies should at once secure specimens of the genus prospector and his frugal outfit ere the species become extinct.

When one can sit in an office with plate glass windows and smoke two bit cigars, while developing the country, who but a fool will turn his back to the summer sun at high noon on the south slope of a shadeless mountain? The hardy prospector whose red flannel shirt cropped out like bull quartz from a porphyry dyke, a plaything alike for the zephyrs of summer and the Borean blasts of cruel winter; the patient and diminutive jackass, bearing stoically all his master's burthens and wealth; the conglomerate pack of blankets, picks, shovels, drills, sledge, grub, pots, pans and dishes—all these will be no more. The hairy and teated sow-belly, the sodden dough-god, the esthetic bean, the bloated dried apple, will become a rapidly glimmering reminiscence of a legendary age. The camp fire will no more send its gladsome rays through the ragged curtains of the night, a greeting and a benediction across the yawning canyon to some other grimy seeker after the hidden wealth in the bosom of Mother Earth. The odor of bacon and coffee, salcratus and burnt beans will no more mingle with the mountain breezes, the voice of the burro no longer awaken the slumbering echoes, the camp fire no more flirtatiously wink back at the twinkling stars that are making a night of it, the solemn pines no more whisper weird tales of wealth into the ears of the miner until his bearded lips part in a smile at the visions woven into the warp of his dreams; the brooks shall cease their babbling tales of yellow stores hidden beneath their mossy banks; forty-rod whiskey shall no longer effervesce through the internal stringers of that same miner like sulphuric acid through carbonate ores.

All! all! will be lost, superseded by the modern and easy way of opening mines with a barrel of printer's ink, a box of cigars and a corkscrew.
