SIN AND SINNERS.

Now that Mr. and Mrs. Bradbury have kissed and made up and are dwelling in renewed marital bliss, it is to be hoped that the country shall hear no more about them. By his spectacular forgiveness of the woman the man may have exhibited a truly Christian spirit, but he has forfeited whatever public sympathy her gross offense earned for him. Men should be made to understand that unreasoning kindness to the wife who has betrayed her wifely trust is cruelty to society, for every such person who escapes the just penalty of her sin multiplies sinners.—Telegram.

"The woman tempted me and I did eat," was the pitiful defense set up by that contemptible old coward, Adam, when he had disobeyed the commands of God. That example has been followed persistently ever since that occasion by all, or nearly all, of his descendants. The poor, weak man has been not only excused for his lapses from virtue, but patted on the back and lionized therefor. It is the woman in the case whose weak shoulders must bear the double load of blame.

Was ever there a more cruel, vindictive and utterly damnable statement made than that above quoted that "Men should be made to understand that unreasoning kindness to the wife who has betrayed her wifely trust is cruelty to society, for every such person who escapes the just penalty of her sin multiplies sinners." One reading it would almost be persuaded it was written by a woman, for "man's inhumanity to man" is, when compared to woman's vindictiveness towards woman, as the purr of a kitten to the roar of a tiger.

According to the Telegram, this one offense should not be condoned, not because it is an offense against the laws of God, but because it is "cruel" to that bewrinkled strumpet, "Society." But let the Telegram's suggestion be carried out. Set aside the divine example where such men as the editor of the Telegram were requested to "first cast a stone," and put this theory in practice, but let it apply to the men as well as the women. Let it be understood that "Women should be made to understand that unreasoning kindness to the husband who has betrayed his marital trust is cruelty to society, for every such person who escapes the just penalty of his sin multiplies sinners." What would be the result? It would require additional courts to attend to the divorce business, and inside of three years "the divine institution of marriage" would be a back number.

There is not one of these cases in a thousand where the woman is not more sinned against than sinning; not one in a thousand but that the man, the chief sinner, hides, as did his cowardly old ancestor, behind the woman.

Disregard of marital vows is an offense against civilization as well as against the divine law; but while man is universally excused for it, we see no reason why woman, the weaker of the two, should be universally damned. While the wife forgives the husband seventy times seven times, her own slips should be forgiven at least once. Laxity of morals is the greatest danger to our civilization, and when man is brought to the pillory and punished for his offenses, then and then only should woman be placed without the pale of society, and her touch considered a contamination. When Bradbury forgave his wife he probably only put in execution the golden rule with this difference that he did as he had already been done by.

B. R. Shaw, writing from the Clondyke, intimates that while it is wonderfully rich, it is not, as far as is known, anything like as extensive as at first stated. He says about 200 claims are very rich. One sentence in his letter should be remembered. It is: "Of course I am too late to get in on any of the rich ground, but hope to get hold of some that I can make miner's wages at, or better." We stated a day or so ago that the history of all very rich mining sections showed that they were of limited area, and suggested that the Clondyke would be no exception. This will probably prove true, though it is undoubtedly one of the greatest gold strikes ever made in the world. We re-print Mr. Shaw's letter for the benefit of those thinking of going to Alaska this summer. No doubt other rich sections will be found, and Alaska for the young, vigorous and ambitious man offers great inducements. There are millions of acres of unprospected territory yet that have remained for hundreds of thousands of years without getting away, and they will keep until next summer. Early spring is time enough to go, and those who go now, unless they have interests there already, will suffer privation, hardship and disappointment.

The strike situation in Pennsylvania is taking a new phase from the fact that the miners are getting hungry, and therefore desperate. It will not be at all surprising if there is bloodshed ere long, and perhaps a repetition of the Homestead riots. It is undoubtedly true that the coal miners are not paid enough for their work to permit them to live, and that far at least they are justifiable in striking. The natural remedy suggested is that the price of coal be advanced to a point that will permit the paying of wages sufficient at least to support life. The consumers of coal cannot expect to get it at a price less than the actual cost of production.

Many people wonder why such persistent effort is made to reach the north pole. The true reason is that the geographical societies want to know something about the climb it.
