A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH. A Friend Pays a Tribute to the Late Mary C. Bills.

When a life that has been so long before ne, almost coeval with the length of the century is closed, it is fitting that we should give it more than a passing

Mary C. Bills was born in Prussian Germany in 1804. She was a happy little girl, playing among the hills of fatherland unconscious of the great events then transpiring around her convulsing a continent, and filling history's pages since to overflowing. She was too young to care much personally when Queen Luise, the beloved, made her appeal for the preservation of her threatened country, to the ruthless power that was then overthrowing thrones and kingdoms, and setting up others in their places. But she was not too young to remember when her father came home and said: "All must now arm for the defense of their country." "I, too, father?" she asked. "Yes, you too, if I could only make a man of you." The closing scene of the battle of Waterloo was a vivid memory to her as the fugitives fled from the bloody field, bearing such news as they might in that newspaperless age.

She lived the greater part of her long life in her adopted country, America, but never did her tongue learn any but the talk of fatherland. Her German Bible was her constant companion; it's precepts the daily rule of her life. She was left a widow at the age of 23, with two daughters, one of whom is now living in Wisconsin. The other, who married a man of the same name as herself. and a distant relative, is buried in Sun-

Man's Affections. "It is the easiest thing in the world," aid a young lady, according to the Chiago Journal, "to tell if a young man in love with you. Yet scores of irls, just because they do not think nough of themselves, overlook the canifestations of sincere regard which nust always precede a definite con-cession of love.

"Now, a young man in love, or partin love, always listens to every word he utters. This is so invariably the ule that a girl, when in company with he young man and others, may address ome remark of little interest to no me in particular, and address it in such manner that it is impossible for it to e heard. If the young man is more ian ordinarily fond of the girl he will vince special interest in that remark, nd will not rest satisfied till he has disovered what it was.

Then, again, a young man in love can, then in company with several, more cadily converse with them than with he object of his affection. For this cason he often appears to be far more nterested in some girl he cares little or than the girl he loves. Some young en also develop a habit of contradictg statements made by the girl they fond of. This seems an absurd hing to do, but it is a fact that many ove affairs take rise out of incessant playful quarrelings."
