ERUPTION OF VESUVIUS.

It Fulfills an Ancient Prophecy of St. Januarius.

The City of Naples in the Throes of Fear in Consequence of the Fulfillment—History of the Prophecy.

Ancient Naples, the most picturesque of cities, of which a poet once wrote: "See Naples, and die," is in the throes of fear, for an ancient prophecy has come to pass, and Vesuvius is belching forth fire and brimstone and endangering the town.

The prophecy in question relates to the clotted blood of St. Januarius, or San Genarvio, preserved in a phial in the chapel bearing the saint's name (a part of the great cathedral built in 1272). Legend has it that whenever the blood of the saint shall fail to liquefy on May 1 or on September 19 then will disaster overtake Naples.

Scarcely had the news been spread when Vesuvius began to grumble and roar in anger, and the worst eruption since the memorable and disastrous one of 1872 began.

There are a dozen or more saints named Januarius, but the patron saint of Naples is the only one who played a great role in the history of early Christianity in the kingdom of Naples.

It may be worth something to know that the very best medicine for restoring the tired out nervous system to a healthy vigor is Electric Bitters.

It is a strange coincidence that Vesuvius should depart from its good behavior of the last 25 years, just at a moment when Naples expected some terrible happening.

Palmeri was one of the most remarkable characters of the century, and no history of the crater would be complete without a lengthy reference to Palmeri, its master and watcher.

So expert did he become and so accustomed to the vagaries of the volcano that he could predict coming eruptions or earthquakes for weeks in advance.

During the great eruption of 1872 he remained at his post although the temperature in his observatory rose to 130 degrees and though lava flowed all around, though red hot cinders and ashes filled the air.

A few months after this eruption he descended into the smoking crater, where he made measurements showing that the capacity of the volcano was 20,000,000 cubic yards and that during the eruption just passed an equal amount of molten rock and lava had been thrown up.
