Trapped a Bear.

EDITOR CHRONICLE:
Mr. Frank Connelly, who left The Dalles in July in company with Casey McDonald, intending to engage in sturgeon fishing along the coast, writes to his friends that he killed a large black bear recently that yielded him seven gallons of lard.

As fish did not seem to be very plentiful and bear tracks were numerous along the river, he probably concluded that bruin was causing the scarcity of fish in that vicinity, and accordingly set a trap to catch him and awaited developments. A few days after, anxious to know results, he visited the vicinity of the trap, and when within about fifty yards of it, he heard the mingled sounds of scratching claws and angry growls, hearing no deadly weapon with him, he wisely concluded to make no further advance on the enemy, but all possible haste to the nearest neighbor, two miles away, for a gun. Securing one, he hastened back to the scene of dreadful circumstances, and selecting an easy tree to climb, within easy range of bruin, he brought his gun to his shoulder, took dead aim, pulled the trigger, and the gun happening to be loaded, bruin bit the dust.

This same veteran hunter killed a small cub some fifteen years ago in the Cascade mountains and tracked another one into a hole in the ground. He is justly proud of this last achievement, and his record as a successful bear trapper, is the envy of all the fishermen along the river.
