Constant vigilance is the price of progress. Forethought must be used which will picture future conditions, and plans laid for meeting them. No one need think the conditions in Oregon will be, during the next ten years, what they were during the last decade. Competition is keener, our position is less isolated, and we must struggle even to maintain the prestige we now possess. The Dalles should make great strides during the next three years; but we never can do it unless an energetic move is made to establish industries here which will support pay rolls and consume the natural products of the country. Such a move has become a necessity, and it should be the proud duty of every citizen to assist in its consummation. The press of The Dalles Las long pointed out this need, and if constant rubbing will wear away the stone, then some day success will crown the effort.
