A DANGEROUS PORTENT.

Not since the days of the memorable Tweed ring in New York City have the citizens of that place been called upon to participate in a municipal campaign which promised more momentous results than does the contest now being waged for the mayoralty. The forces of corruption are united against the adherents of good government, as they have been on former occasions, but a new element has entered into the situation, which promises, unless nipped in the bud, to grow into an alarming portent. Henry George, the well-known socialistic leader, is waging an aggressive fight, and is being enthusiastically supported by the discontented dreamers and agitators of all ranks and conditions. The worst elements of our political life are supporting George, and he in return is promising to the rabble all the objects which, in their perverted judgment, they have long desired. George is a socialist in an extreme sense, and though heretofore a man of seeming honesty of purpose, he has degenerated into a low type of demagogue. In an address made a night or two ago he made use of this remarkable language:

For the republic now I care nothing; but it is to the republic that is coming that I bow down to worship. Not a republic of tramps and millionaires; not a republic where one man has the power of a czar; not to this republic, but to the one which is yet to come, a republic of God, a Christian republic in the true sense of the word.

What this means the dullest can understand. It is the statement of a mind too visionary to deal with the practical affairs of a world such as this. It raises the question seriously whether a great portion of the American people are capable of self government. The country has long suffered from political corruption, and now it must do battle against the wild theories of irresponsible dreamers.

Tammany's rule in New York is bad enough, but the election of George would be far worse for the substantial interests of the city. As far as the local interests of New York's citizens are concerned, the defeat of George is as necessary as the overthrow of Bryan. If Low cannot be elected, as seems doubtful now, at least George should be defeated, and that would leave the spoils with Tammany, a condition to which New York people are long accustomed.

Everything points to a mighty rush to Alaska in the spring. The interest has not died out, nor does it lie very dormant. The stories of hardship told by returning miners have not dampened the ardor of the gold-seekers, and the discoveries of new claims along Copper creek have intensified the fever. From all over the United States parties are planning to leave for Klondike and the adjacent fields, and the movement of last fall will be eclipsed by the rush in the spring. Portland is acting wisely in preparing for the trade that will surely be conducted with the Northwest. Seattle has the bulge so far, but the very satisfactory traffic arrangements which Portland has secured places it in a position to be a considerable factor in this new business. With the great harvest and high prices and the stimulation all lines of trade have from the Klondike excitement, the country promises to be in the midst of prosperity, which even the Bryanites will have to admit to be real.
