FIFTEEN YEARS LATE.

Sunday evening about 6:30 a special train of two sleepers, a diner and the private car of the general manager of the O. R. & N. arrived here on its way to Pomeroy, Spokane, Baker City, Boise City and other inland points. On board were forty-five of Portland's business men, who go out to get acquainted with the people of the Inland Empire, who for forty years have dealt with them. No one here knew they were to come, and but few would know that they had been here did the local press not so inform them.

The train was side-tracked near the Umatilla House, remaining for forty minutes. The curtains were pulled down, except here and there, and these disclosed a serious and devout looking few engaged in playing cards or admiring one another. Five of them got off the train, gazed a few moments and crowded back on again, Wiley B. Allen, the dealer in musical instruments, being about the only one that had life enough to make an attempt to get acquainted. The train pulled out amid a dull, sickening silence that had all the hilarity of a funeral.

We regret this; we regret that this visit was not made fifteen years ago, before the wall of prejudice against Portland had become so high and so strong; we regret it the more because our interests are those of Portland, and those of Portland ours. We have realized the truth of this proposition for forty years; Portland is only beginning to discover it, when, after years of neglect, the Inland Empire, whose wealth has been poured for more than thirty years into her lap, has found that Portland is far from being the only pebble on the beach, the only letter in the alphabet because she is a J, and has gone, or is going, elsewhere to trade.

The feeling in Eastern Oregon towards Portland is peculiar. The business people have many warm personal friends in the city, and no especial dislike for any of the citizens of Portland. Individually there is no feeling against them, but against the city, unfortunately for all concerned, there is an extremely bitter feeling. It began over Portland's neglect of her own interests, and ours; in doing nothing towards assisting us to an open river. It grew through the actions of the politicians, who looked upon the bunch-grassers as their property, and has been emphasized by the arrogance of Portland's daily newspaper.

The Klondike excitement opened the eyes of the few still friendly to Portland to that city's methods and selfishness. Portland that had for years paid no attention to Eastern Oregon, suddenly became alive to trade possibilities in the far north. She began to reach out after it, to spend her money to get it, to advertise in every way for it. The Klondike has so far produced a few millions, not $100,000 of which has ever reached Portland. On the other hand, for years Eastern Oregon has poured her untold millions into Portland's lap, and has received neglect, contempt and ingratitude in return. Portland has done more in three months to catch the Klondike trade than she did in forty years to hold the trade of the Inland Empire. The result of her neglect she has felt in the past few years in decreased business and hard times. She did not know what was the matter with her, but attributed it all to the general hard times. She did not know, nor does she now, that the trade that was once all her's, that might still have been her's, has left her, perhaps for good. She did not know that the money of the Inland Empire now goes East for goods, or that Seattle is selling dollars' worth to her times. This is true, and yet not all the truth, for the half is not mentioned.

This article is not written in a fault-finding or carping spirit. The writer realizes that it is a bad condition for all concerned; that the way to build up our state is to patronize our own people, and that it would be better for us, better for Portland, could the barrier between them be broken down. It will not be done by such advertising committees as passed through The Dalles last night; that pulled down the curtains on their cars as though fearful the privacy of their sanctuary might be invaded by some uncouth bunch-grasser. It will not be done by visiting committees who rush by Portland's best patrons to seek in the far-off Boise a new field.

It is not too late for Portland to regain her lost trade, but she has created competition for herself, and that competition she must now meet and vanquish.
