WHITMAN.

Fifty years have rolled between the Whitman massacre at Waiilatpu and the present day. They have been fifty years of heroic endeavor and great achievement. Alaska is not wilder today than was the vast region of the trans-Mississippi half a century ago. St. Louis, the metropolis of the West and the South, had fewer than 50,000 people. Chicago had fewer than 20,000. Omaha, Kansas City, Minneapolis, St. Paul and Denver were not in existence. San Francisco had 450 people, and Portland, with 200 or 300 population, was lost in the vast, solemn and continuous forests of the Oregon.

These fifty years have been luminous with the refulgent rise of the star of empire. States have been founded, cities constructed, and railroads laid across the prairies and through the mountain passes. And with these achievements have come schoolhouses and colleges, churches and hospitals, and all the multitudinous benefits and blessings which are the accompaniment of the highest civilization. The wild region of the Oregon, which fifty years ago stood as the apotheosis of the wilderness and desert places of the earth, has four cities, all rivaling in population, in wealth and grandeur any of the cities of the union then in existence, with the exception of a few places on the Atlantic seaboard.

Fifty years ago savage ignorance and fury extinguished the life of the man who did more than any other one man to plant the seed of empire on these shores. Whitman was more a martyr to the flag than to the cross. So long as he confined his labors to the mission work at Waiilatpu he was in no danger. He was slain for bringing immigrants into the country.

"Ever since the return of Whitman in 1843," says Bancroft, "he had lived over a smoldering volcano." That was the year in which he guided nearly a thousand immigrants into the Oregon country. "Year after year," continues the historian, "an army of white people came from east of the Rocky mountains, on whom the aborigines looked with distrustful anger.

They were angry with Whitman because he did not leave the country, because he raised grain on their land and sold it to the immigrants. This had been their temper all along; but in 1847 it had seemed to take a more aggressive form, either because they had been told that the United States then claimed sovereignty, or because in their own minds their dissatisfaction was fully ripe, and the sword, so long suspended, was ready to fall."

Further proof that the Indians killed Whitman because he brought the white people into their country is found in the fact that his missionary associates were spared. The missions at Lapwai, in Idaho, and at Walker's Prairie, north of Spokane, escaped. Indian cunning taught the savages that Whitman, more than any other living man, was responsible for the increasing invasion of their country, and in a spirit of revenge and fear they resolved upon his murder.

After fifty years of humiliating neglect, the people of the Pacific Northwest are bestowing tardy respect and honor to the memory of this patriotic American. The commemorative exercises at his grave will be an enduring lesson to old and young. They will prove an inspiration to patriotism, and an incentive to lofty American manhood and womanhood. The history of this nation has no example more inspiring than the life and death of Marcus Whitman and Narcissa, his wife.—Spokesman—Review.

War between Austria and Turkey has been averted by the surrender of the latter. Trouble between Germany and China, however, may yet take place. A conflict between these two nations might easily draw Russia in, and then the area of the disturbance would be sure to spread. The unpleasantness between Germany and Hayti, of course, does not involve the Monroe doctrine, for Germany seeks redress merely, and not an extension of territory. In the Chinese difficulty, though, the Kaiser is suspected to have designs of territorial aggrandizement, and if he should attempt to carry them out there would be a convulsion in Europe. These days the gates of the temple of Janus are never tightly barred.
