SOME WAR-LOAN PERPLEXITIES

The treasury now finds that the small subscribers for bonds, whose number was last week reckoned at 200,000, will actually reach 300,000 or more.

This is giving the treasury people a lot of trouble. First of all, these small subscribers nearly all seem disposed to pay for their bonds in cash, and there is fear that too much money will thus be withdrawn from circulation and locked up in the treasury until needed for war expenses. So the authorities are urging subscribers to take the credit period allowed to them.

Another difficulty is that the express companies have put a limit upon the amount for which they are willing to become responsible. To avoid excessive liability they refuse to receive more than a fixed sum in bonds each day for transmission. As there are 300,000 separate parcels of bonds to be delivered, the work of distribution promises to be tedious.

But it is worth all the trouble. It creates a great and influential body of government creditors scattered all over the country. The fact that bankers are eagerly bidding 104 and more for the bonds before their delivery is an object lesson in the credit of the United States. It is teaching the people that the very men whose business it is to gauge credit think so well of United States securities that they will take them at three per cent, and throw off a year and a quarter's interest in order to get them.

The popular loan is one of the very greatest of the benefits of war.

A London paper says: "The lessons to be drawn from the Spanish American sea fights are not clear, satisfactory and conclusive." This reminds us to remark that the lessons to be drawn from the American-Spanish sea fights are clear in that they prove as clearly as light shines through unclouded crystal that to win sea fights you must have better gunners than your enemy's; they are satisfactory because they teach without doubt or confusion the value of—in addition to good gunnery—courage, discipline and intelligence; they are conclusive—well, ask Montojo and Cervera.

With a reported speed of twenty-one knots an hour the Cristobal Colon when running for her life succeeded in making an actual speed of 13.7 knots for less than four hours. It is probable that this loss of one-third of her speed was due in part to bad coal, and a very small part of it may be due to the condition of her bottom, but it is more than likely that the chief cause of her failure and loss was the inability of the Spanish engineers to keep her motive power in good condition. This furnishes an interesting suggestion for the other naval powers of Europe.

Commodore Schley's modest and generous words, "I am glad that I had an opportunity to contribute in the least to a victory that seems big enough for us all," will redound to his honor almost as much as his conspicuous part in winning the great fight. When the question of the credit was first raised as between Sampson and Schley. The World said: "There is glory enough for both." Commodore Schley improves upon this in saying that there was glory enough for all.

While it is grammatically correct to say that Gen. Miles has "landed in Porto Rico," it would not be improper to amend the expression in accordance with the phraseology of the prize-ring and say that he has "landed on Porto Rico," and landed heavily.

It's a good thing to remember that there are many kinds of drugs; good, bad and indifferent. Drugs are important. Inferior drugs may not only fail to cure, but may prove worse than the original trouble. Parity of drugs is our hobby. They're the only kind fit to use.
