WHAT VOLUNTEERS LACKED.

The last number of the Army and Navy Journal contains an article that points out the necessity of discipline in diet and habit among troops in active service. The writer shows that the regular army has the advantage over volunteers because the latter represent regulations as to food as an interference with their personal rights and privileges. Surgeons have little difficulty in handling regulars, but find it almost impossible to control sick or convalescent volunteers. In the present war certain rules were prescribed for campaigns in the tropics. The regular officers insisted on the observance of these whenever possible. The volunteers as a rule laughed at them.

In the civil war the regulars lost a larger percentage in battle than the volunteers, but a far less proportion from disease. During the civil war 831 regulars and 34,582 volunteers were killed in action, 1,174 regulars and 48,032 volunteers died of wounds, and 3,009 regulars and 183,207 volunteers died of disease. The mortality from disease among the regulars was 47 per cent; among the volunteers 75 per cent. Among the regulars the deaths from disease were only one-half more than from battle losses; among the volunteers nearly two and a quarter times as great.

The men of the regular service are not only closely supervised in the matter of clothing, diet and sanitary conditions but they are trained to unflinching acceptance of whatever war brings. It is the habit of new volunteers to regard army rations with hostility and they are encouraged in this by their friends at home. The regulars understand that the army rations are made up of what experience has demonstrated as the best possible under the the circumstances. Every man is informed as to what is his due and as to how to make the most of what is issued to him. The volunteers who served through the civil war were as well informed on this subject as the regulars, and they never quarreled with their rations. Among some of the new regiments in this war army rations were regarded as little better than a means of punishment. Neither officers nor men looked carefully after their supplies, and too often they wasted food which the regulars would have made good use of.

The volunteers worried over restraint, resisted discipline in the matter of camp duties, gave free rein to disappointment, and longed for the luxuries of home. The regulars were trained to eat what the army authorities believed was good for them and to observe regulations to prevent disease. When it came to fighting, the volunteers were the peers of the regulars; when it came to exposure and sickness, there was no comparison; the regulars had the advantage.

The conclusion of the writer in the Army and Navy Journal is that the volunteers are more reckless of life in camp than they are in battle. They must be trained to fight off disease as well as to shoot at enemies; must submit to discipline in the care of themselves in camp as well as to discipline in the ranks.

"Assassination," said Disraeli, in referring to Lincoln's death, "has never changed the history of the world." The meaning of the great British statesman's aphorism was that assassination never accomplished the object its authors had in view. Lincoln's own taking off, which was, of course, as profoundly regretted in the south as in the north, added to the troubles and difficulties which his hare-brained murderer doubtless desired and expected to diminish. The blindness and folly of assassination are its most striking features. When the nihilists killed Alexander II, of Russia, in 1881 they removed the emancipator of 24,000,000 serfs and put in his place the cruel and gloomy bigot Alexander III, who drove the Jews out of his dominions. A few days ago, just after the world heard of the present Czar's proposition to reduce national armies and to further the cause of international peace, it read of an elaborate attempt to murder him. The assassination of the Empress of Austria removes a worthy and popular woman, without diminishing in the faintest degree the powers or pretensions of crowned heads in any part of the world or of helping any person or cause anywhere. Even when it has any purpose, the assassination of potentates is the densest sort of political stupidity.—Globe Democrat.

Beats the Klondike.

Mr. A. C. Thomas, of Marysville, Tex., has found a more valuable discovery than has yet been made in the Klondike. For years he suffered untold agony from consumption, accompanied by hemorrhages; and was absolutely cured by Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, Coughs and Colds. He declares that gold is of little value in comparison with this marvelous cure; would have it, even if it cost a hundred dollars a bottle. Asthma, Bronchitis and all throat and lung affections are positively cured by Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption. Trial bottles free at Blakeley & Houghton's drug store. Regular size 50 cents and $1.00. Guaranteed to cure or price refunded.
