FOURTEEN WERE RIGHT.

If General Grant still lived, in the full possession of his faculties, he could not express himself upon the great question of the day more strongly and pointedly than he did in his second inaugural address, March 4, 1873. "I do not," he said, "speak of the separation held by many as to the danger of government becoming centralized and so strongly by reason of their extension of territory. Commerce, education and rapid transit of thought and matter by telegraph and steam have changed all this. Easier, I believe, than our Great Maker is preparing the world in its own good way to become one nation, speaking one language, and when armies and navies will no longer be required."

The question of expansion at that time in its immediate practical bearing was of comparatively trivial moment. It is related to a small island in the West Indies which Denmark was willing to sell to this country. At that time the country at large took no interest in the subject.

The United States has had twenty-four presidents, and with the one exception of Grover Cleveland not one of us all ever opposed the extension of our national territory, and no fewer than fourteen of them left records in support of the expansion policy. In one way or another each one of the factions declared by deed or word what General Grant so well expressed in the words quoted above.
