THE FIRST AMERICAN EXPANSIONIST.

There was a beautiful dash of incongruity in the spectacle of William J. Bryan as an orator on the occasion of a Washington birthday anniversary celebration in the national capital, but it was entirely characteristic. In 1897 Bryan made a speech in favor of throwing the mints of the country wide open to silver on the birthday anniversary of Jefferson, the man who, on his own authority, closed all the mints of the country to silver. In 1898 Bryan made a speech in favor of the bogus dollar at an anniversary of the battle of New Orleans, held to commemorate the memory of a robust champion of the honest dollar, who, if Bryan had been active in Jackson's days, Jackson would have been strongly tempted to hang, as he did Ambrister and Arbuthnot in Florida during the Seminole war. This year when Bryan spoke at the exercises in the national capital on February 22nd, the memory of the first of American expansionist was celebrated by the noisiest and most persistent of American anti-expansionists.

Earlier even than Hamilton or Jefferson, Washington was an expansionist. Long before the war of independence, Washington saw the necessity of uniting the region West of the Alleghenies to the Eastern states by wagon roads and waterways. When he went on that historic embassy in 1753 to warn the French to get out of the Ohio valley he saw the military importance of the site on which Pittsburg now stands, and began his studies of the best way to connect the rivers flowing into the Mississippi with those running to the Atlantic. This was when the whole region east of the Alleghenies belonged to England, and sixteen years before Daniel Boone got his first glimpse of Kentucky. He had social interest in the Western country before the French and Indian war, and his confidence in the future of the trans-Allegheny locality led him to be among the first of investors in its lands. He formed projects for connecting the Potomac with the Youghiogheny river by a high road over the mountains, and thus establish close connection between the Ohio and Mississippi and the Atlantic seaboard.

At a time when the Eastern states were either jealous or apathetic in their attitude toward the West, Washington saw the importance of keeping interests of the Western settlers closely united with those of the older part of the country. With a clear vision regarding the necessity of knitting the West to the East by bonds of social and pecuniary interest than was possessed by any other man of his day, and thus to head off the secession and separatist movements which he foresaw would arise in the West if the needs of that section in the way of communication with the outer world were neglected by the East, he urged congress to, in his own words in one of his letters to a congressman in 1777, "extend the navigation of the Eastern waters, to open them to the Ohio, and to bind the Western people to us by a chain which can never be broken." As president a few years later, he advanced the same ideas in messages to congress and in letters to influential men West and East. He was the first of great Americans to cross the Alleghenies; he saw more of the Eastern side of the Mississippi valley than any other American statesman of his day; he grasped the necessity of extending the settlements to the Mississippi earlier and in a clearer way than any other man of his time, and he, as president, did more than any other man of his period to defeat the plots—British, French, Spanish and American—which were concocted in the years between 1784 and 1795 to separate the Western settlements from the rest of the country. Washington was the first and the greatest of American expansionists.—Globe-Democrat.

As the season of the year when pneumonia, la grippe, sore throat, coughs, colds, catarrh, bronchitis and lung troubles are to be guarded against, nothing "is a fine substitute," will "answer the purpose," or is "just as good" as One Minute Cough Cure. That is the one infallible remedy for all lung, throat or bronchial troubles. Inset vigorously upon having it if "something else" is offered you. Snipes-Kinersly Drug Co.
