A SONG CONTEST.

How the Poets of Provence Amused Their King and Themselves in the Olden Times.

As the good king Rene looked at his gay company and the brilliantly hung hall and the long tables, his eyes sparkled with delight, and his heart swelled with pleasure when he thought of the coming contest; for he was never so happy as when thus surrounded by his dear troubadours, whom he loved to make in every way as happy as possi-

Then, when all was ready, a gayly dressed herald came into the hall, and kneeling before the king, and bowing to the assembled company, an-nounced the coming of the two counts, William and Reynaurd. Pierrot and Henri, each of whom carried a viol bedecked with long silken ribbons.

When the counts had saluted the king and taken their places before him, he commanded a seneschal to bear in the prize, and so the beautiful collar of jewels was brought in upon a silver tray and placed on a carved bench beside the king. Then a herald stepped out, and, lifting the collar upon the point of a flower-wreathed lance, displayed it to all the company and announced the terms of the contest of song about to take place.

The perversion of English words when adopted by foreigners is often strange, as in the Franco-English "biftek;" but this, if we may trust a correspondent, has been far transcended by the journalists of Spain, who are said to have adopted a slang which appears in the form of "igili" or "gili." It is rather a puzzler to be told that the word is English. What is really meant is "high life."-London Chron-
