ROOSEVELT'S VISIT

The visit of Governor Roosevelt to the White house and his confab with President McKinley will furnish unlimited material for combinations on paper in the future, says the Spokesman-Review. Not for years has a possible presidential rival been taken into such intimate association with the gentleman in the executive mansion. Conferences there have been with the leaders of the party, and there have been private audiences almost without number; but to pass the whole day and night under the same roof with the president, to eat and sleep in the home of the first gentleman in the land is so unique a proceeding, considering the ambitions of the parties concerned, that it will be small wonder if all sorts of prospective combinations are hinted at.

But Governor Roosevelt has been frank in giving out the real object of his visit, and Roosevelt is not of the class of politicians who consider untruths legitimate. His word is as good as his bond with most Americans, and his promises are kept to the letter. In summoning him for consultation as to the competency of officers for the new volunteer regiments, the administration demonstrates that the lessons of the war in Cuba have been of some value. To the mistakes of Alger in appointing sons of congressmen and senators, relatives of influential politicians and other gentlemen with "pulls" was due a large part of the suffering which followed the landing of the troops at Santiago. The officers were loyal enough, most of them were willing and anxious to do right, but they lacked the experience, the physique, and they lacked the confidence of the regular army chieftains who for years had been accustomed to perfectly trained subalterns.

It seems to be tacitly admitted by the administration that it made a grievous mistake at the outset of hostilities, and it is setting about to avoid the same pitfalls in the regiments about to form. In a way, notice is served on the unscrupulous politicians that their interference in the war department will no longer be tolerated. To obtain a command in the army of the Philippines will require physical perfection, experience in the art of fighting, and ability to direct the movements and care for the comfort of the enlisted men. It means everything for the success of future operations in the islands in state of insurrection, and it will be the cause of preventing the terrible loss of life which darkens the victories in the West Indies.

Few men are better qualified than Governor Roosevelt to give the needed advice to President McKinley. Indeed, a happy solution of the war department problems would be his appointment as secretary of that department. But he has fully no important work on hand in New York state, and the people of that commonwealth will not willingly part with his services. The sole cause of his summons to the White house is exercise of common sense on the part of the president which the nation will applaud. And the system might with propriety be followed by calling on other tried volunteer officers from other sections, for their opinions and prejudices have been tempered to the same point of cautiousness as those of Governor Roosevelt.
