Ringling Bros.' Circus Comes to Grief in a Minnesota Town Where Twisters Floutish.

We learn from the Telegram that Ringling Bros.' circus, which exhibited here last month, and which is the best show ever seen in The Dalles, had a tussle with a wind storm at Crookston, Minn., which was most exciting while it lasted, but by miraculous good luck nobody was killed, though there were broken ribs and other bones, cut heads and many minor bruises before the people were rescued from the tangled mass of canvas, poles and ropes.

The magnificent animal tent was lowered, close hauled, at the beginning of the storm and saved a panic and stampede among the beasts.

The main circus tent, however, was struck at the first blast of the storm. The wind and rain came together, the canvas being lifted on the side where the reserved seats were placed and carried clear over the heads of that portion of the audience, falling in a tangled mass of poles and canvas upon the spectators opposite. In a moment the wildest confusion reigned. The groans of the injured, the shrieks of frightened women and the shouts of men separated in the darkness from their wives and families arose above the fury of the storm, making a veritable bedlam. Cooler heads warned people to remain quiet and in doing so averted a stampede which, had it occurred, would doubtless have resulted in many being tramped to death.

As fast as possible those who were able extricated themselves from the mass of struggling humanity, and sought temporary refuge from the angry elements in surrounding houses and barns.

The proprietors and their force of men worked heroically to rescue the people from the storm-wrecked tent before paying any attention to the circus property further than to make the wild beasts in the menagerie safe.

About 200 people were more or less injured, none seriously, and the circus people, after working all night, pulled out for Fargo next morning soon after daylight.
