WE ARE BUILDING SHIPS.

Work has begun at Newport News on two 18,000-ton steamships for the Pacific Mail. A few days ago at the Union Iron Works in San Francisco the keel was laid for a large merchant steamer, says the Spokesman-Review. The events are notable for the reason that the vessels at Newport News are the largest ever contracted for by an American shipbuilding firm, and the Union Iron Works' ship will be the largest ever built on the Pacific coast.

In most countries the building of a merchant marine is reflected in the navy. In this country the process has been reversed. The work of replacing obsolete wooden naval vessels with modern steel cruisers began seventeen years ago. The vessels first built are still in commission and serviceable. In the Dewey parade Friday could be noticed the Chicago and Dolphin, two of the early vessels of the new navy, and while they are not equal to some of the vessels recently put in commission, they are splendid specimens of marine architecture.

The beginnings were small, but year after year new and better warships were added to our fleet until now the United States constructs the best cruisers, gunboats and battleships in the world, and four or five immense shipbuilding establishments have been created and are doing a prosperous business.

When the reconstruction of the navy began there were British naval experts who told their countrymen to look out for the appearance of a rival in the world's shipbuilding. The majority of Englishmen said we were not to be feared, as we had no plants, no models and no experience in armor plate manufacture. But the experts were right. More than fifty modern ships have been constructed and the building of over one hundred authorized. Moreover, we have built cruisers for Japan, and a battleship and other vessels are being constructed for the government of Russia.

The progress made in this great work of navy building has stimulated the reconstruction of the merchant marine. Large orders from the government for a period of seventeen years have put several large shipbuilding establishments on a solid foundation. Capital has been attracted to the business, splendid bodies of shipwrights have been organized, plate-making plants and steel works have been improved, and the new concerns are prepared to build merchant steamers the equal of any other in the world and far more cheaply than could have been done ten or fifteen years ago.

Already two magnificent Atlantic liners have been built and now fly the American flag. Two more have been ordered by the same company, and with the beginning of the Pacific Mail leviathans and the laying of the keel of the Pacific merchantman at San Francisco there is reason for entertaining the hope that the work of rebuilding the American merchant marine is well under way, and that the work will continue until we have once more taken a prominent position as leading ocean carrier of the world.
