HEROES FOR PRESIDENT.

The association of Admiral Dewey's name with the presidency has brought forth comments from different quarters that military or naval heroes have rarely made good national chief magistrates. As a matter of fact, the real soldiers who have lived in the White House have been among the best of presidents.

Among those soldiers who have occupied the executive chair were Washington, Jackson, W. H. Harrison, Taylor and Grant. For a century no one has been disposed to criticize the administration of George Washington, which was that of a patriot. Partisanship ran high in the days of Andrew Jackson, but the verdict of later years has been that in spite of his rough ways, "kitchen" cabinet and arbitrary nature, he was one of the sturdiest of Americans and a credit to his country.

What Harrison and Taylor might have become as presidents was never known, because of untimely decease, and after them Grant was the first man to be drawn from the ranks of the army. His administration of eight years was not of the best, for it was the era of recklessness following the war, when many new men had come to the front, and most of them were on the make. Grant, who had been a Democrat all his life, became the Republican candidate in 1868, largely because the war had been brought about by the triumph of Republicanism in 1860, and with no experience of any value outside of the army, he was often imposed upon. He stood doggedly by his friends, even when they were unworthy, but in spite of mistakes made during the feverish years from 1868 to 1874, the general verdict is that General Grant was an honest man, one of the best of patriots, and a hero who never intentionally did a wrong.

When Dewey's name is mentioned it is customary to say that he would be no more successful as president than was Grant. The two men in their bringing-up and associations are wholly different. Grant had had a somewhat featureless career on the frontier, and for forty years, up to the time of the capture of Paducah and later Henry and Donelson, his life had been a conspicuous failure. He knew little of men, manners and the world, even when elected to the presidency. Dewey, on the other hand, has been brushing up against the world for forty years. He has been everywhere, lived for years in Washington, met statesmen, politicians, diplomats and men of affairs. He is not the raw product Grant was when the latter came to Washington and was hailed as the greatest man of his time.

The shadows of coming events indicate that the heads of the two tickets of 1896 will again ask for the suffrages of their fellow-countrymen, but of all the military and naval heroes of the century, who have been named for the high place, there is probably no other who by training, associations and experience has better all-around qualifications for the presidency than George Dewey.
